Under the legislation, the money to build the weapons cannot be spent until December 1987, at which point President Ronald Reagan would have to certify that the weapons are Neded. In addition, the two chemicals that are eventually combined in the weapon must be stored in crisis for the president.

Foreign policy and congressional leaders say that at the center of Mr. Reagan's restraint is the reality that a response to the hijackers could cost the hostages' lives. Moreover, they say that retribution, whether immediate or after the hostages are freed, is complicat-ed by the difficulty in identifying those responsible for the crime—a point that Mr. Reagan made several times Tuesday night.

As a result of these factors, the leaders say that Mr. Reagan is echoing a line that Mr. Carter expressed during the 444 days he was hamstrung by Iran, which held Americans hostage during the last year of his presidency.

Koreas Seek To Re-Open

By Young Ho Lee Washington Post Service
PANMUNJOM, Korea — Officials from North and South Korea agreed Thursday to set up a commission to oversee the reopening of commercial ties between the two countries. Economic links between the North and South were suspended shortly before the outbreak of the Korean War in June 1950.

The agreement was viewed in the South as significant progress in the economic cooperation talks that began last year as part of a general thaw in relations.

The hour-and-a-half, closeddoor meeting seemed unusually cordial. Frequent laughter was heard from inside.

Iran Urges International Tribunal to Resolve War

By James M. Dorsey United Press International

TEHRAN - Iran has proposed the creation of an international court to open the way for resolving the war between Iran and Iraq. Diplomats said that the proposal seemed to be an effort to resolve the conflict without explicitly demanding the overthrow of the Iraqi president, Saddam Hussein. In the past, Iran has consistently demanded Mr. Hussein's removal as a condition for peace.

The latest proposal was made Wednesday by Hashemi Rafsanjani, the speaker of the Majlis, Iran's parliament. He summoned foreign diplomats unexpectedly and said he was speaking on behalf of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, the country's leader.

In a reference to Iraq, Mr. Rafsaniani told the diplomats that if certain conditions were fulfilled. it would make it possible for an international court to be set up to determine the punishment to be awarded to the aggressor."

He said that the establishment of an international court would "pave the way for ending the war" that began in September 1980 over border disputes

The Iranian proposal was made less than a week after Iraq announced a halt in its air and missile strikes against Iranian cities, including Tehran, for 15 days. Iraq said it was taking the step to offer franian leaders the opportunity to rethink their conditions for peace. Mr. Rafsanjani urged the international community to acknowl-edge that Iraq had begun the war and "had violated international law by attacking Iranian towns and employing chemical weapons." He also asked the diplomats to convey a letter containing the Iranian proposal to their governments. "We ask you to convey this message to your governments and we await an official reply." he told the diplomats.

Colombian Strike Fails

Most stores and offices were open and buses ran in Bogota, which was under virtual military occupation. When crowds gathered, the police arrested hundreds of people and held them in detention centers. The protest was called by the Communist-led labor confederation and backed by leftist guerrilla groups.

WASHINGTON (WP) - President Ronald Reagan raised tariffs on European pasta products Thursday in retaliation against European Community tariffs on U.S. citrus products.

The move also responded to domestic pasta producers' complaints that EC subsidies to European pasta makers, principally Italians, allow them to sell their pasta products at unfairly low prices in the United States. The EC threatened Wednesday to retaliate if the United States raised tapiffs

The tariffs will be raised from their current rate of about one cent per pound (454 grams) to 40 percent of the foreign cost of pasta and 25 percent of the foreign cost of pasta containing eggs.

Space-Arms Critics See Laser Test Failure as Omen

CAPE CANAVERAL, Florida -Critics of President Ronald Reagan's proposed space defensive shield against enemy missiles have cited the failure Wednesday of a tell Discovery as evidence of bigger problems to come.

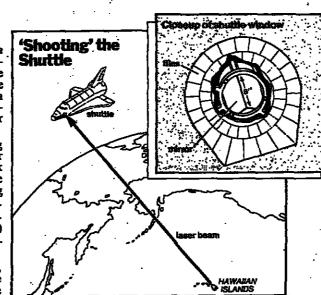

:... _ the failure -- a simple human error capable of upsetting a complex technological effort — was the type that could be the ultimate undoing of the proposed anti-missile shield.

These people are seizing on ridiculous things to try to criticize the program," said Lieutenant General James A. Abrahamson, director of the Pentagon's Strategic Defense Initiative Organization. They either have an ax to grind or don't understand how experiments are conducted.

"If your car doesn't start in the morning, does that mean 'star wars' isn't going to work? There's no log-ic to it. We had a small procedural error. All you have to to do is wait for the rest of the mission and we'll have a successful experiment, I'm

The key part of the experiment was to take place on the ground, where computers at the air force's Mani Optical Station were to adjust the laser beam to try to counteract the distorting effects of the Earth's turbulent atmosphere.

But when controllers radioed a series of numbers to direct the aniomatic pilot to align the Discovery properly, some of the numbers were in units of feet rather than nautical miles. This confused the shuttle's flight control system, which pointed the mirror in the opposite direction, directly facing the stars.

In contrast with problems aboard the shuttle, the laser on the ground worked perfectly in the predawn darkness, sending its beam flashing up to the Discovery.

Reagan and the Hostages

President Reagan states and the Israelis state that there can be no negotiating with terrorists, otherwise these will be encouraged to sally forth and terrorize again. With the second part of this statement all agree. When terrorists reclaim captured comrades, humble a government or draw attention or political advantage to their cause, they have won something of value and their success is bound to encourage them or others to have another go. What this formulation omits, however, is that there are only a finite number of ways to fight back, once hostages have been taken.

There is force; Mr. Reagan seems to rule it out. Bringing nonviolent pressures to bear over time to induce the terrorists to recalculate the odds is the route he appears closer to endorsing, despite its similarity to Jimmy Carter's course in Iran. Otherwise there is the painful course of negotiations. It offers the prospect of quick relief and spared lives this time, but provides incentives for further terrorism.

The Israelis' pattern is the most relevant. It is to refuse to negotiate; to negotiate if necessary; to swear they will never negotiate again, and, meanwhile, to tear themselves apart over whether it was wise to have negotiated. A country that cares for human life and has a government responsive to public feeling cannot expect to have it another way. Deterrence — that is, community with prospective victims — has its just claims, but the full burden of it cannot easily be put on current victims. Community with them has its claims, too. Equating negotiating with "caving" is no help. It de-ends on the circumstances and the terms.

The International Committee of the Red Cross appears, still, to be in a position to facilitate the indirect negotiation that has lain there ready to be pursued from the start. The Shifte terrorists can release the hostages, and the Israelis, bowing to no one, can release the Shiite prisoners whom they hold on their soil and had already determined to release anyway; the hijacking interrupted the onset of the release. It will be tough on the Israeli public, which has reason to worry about terrorism. and on the Israeli government, whose opposi-tion is already exploiting the issue, and it will win Israel respect from decent people.

A range of more effective policies, from physical security to diplomatic pre-emption, has to be put into place to ensure the safety of Americans. Where these policies fail, a range of other ways, not excluding retribution, must be found to demonstrate that there are costs to terrorizing Americans or allowing others to. Giving Greece fresh reason to improve its lax security should be only a start.

There has been a strong temptation all week to throw President Reagan's bluster straight back at him, and it boiled over at his news conference on Tuesday. As a candidate he had suggested repeatedly that Jimmy Carter handled the Iranian hostage crisis like a wimp, and after his election he warned terrorists worldwide that real men don't eat quiche. "We hear it said that we live in an era of limit to our powers," he said in welcoming the Iran hostages home. "Well, let it also be understood, there are limits to our patience."

It is not hard to understand reporters' desire to puncture the bluster, to seek retrospective justice for Mr. Carter. Aren't you frustrated? the reporters asked. Haven't you now learned something about the limits of power? Aren't you now compelled to be patient, too?

Enough. Such questions are understandable but they are also digressions. Whether or not Mr. Reagan confesses to having once been simplistic, that does not lessen the complexity of the torment that he and the country now face. The question honed by the hijacking and cowardly murder is not whether the president is behaving consistently but whether he is behaving wisely, and so far the answer is yes.

With Lebanon as with Iran, there are people who think that the way to demonstrate strength is with strength, by which they mean violence. The same frustrated chauvinism that prompted proposals in 1979 to bomb Tehran into a parking lot now lead to talk of leveling Lebanese villages. That is not the president's view. On the contrary. Precisely because of his

- THE WASHINGTON POST. past hawkish simplicities, it is decidedly appealing when he now declares his primary goal to be the safe return of the hostages, and when he rejects any lashing back in the other direction as "a terrorist act in itself." There are few formulas for fighting these modern shadow wars. The only sensible one is to fight them one at a time, looking for differences, for diplomatic handholds. In 1979 the shah was in a New York hospital; in 1985 some 700 Shiites are in tents in Israel. Central facts always differ. Mr. Reagan knows it. Indeed, he is trying too hard to hide behind the distinctions. He says the crime in Iran was committed by an identifiable government but in Lebanon the criminals are unidentified individuals. Really? Is it harder to deal with Nabih Berri, the Lebanese minister of justice, than it was with Mehdi Bazargan, who for a few feeble weeks was called prime minister of Iran? Nevertheless, the president and his colleagues are so far pursuing the right goal, and with the true strength of subtlety and patience. They are tempering the natural instinct for vengeance with humane honor. Better to pound walls in private presidential frustration than to bomb villages in blind anger.

President Carter "has skirted the twin dangers of inaction and overreaction," we wrote at the start of the Iranian hostage crisis. "He deserves admiration and support." Let all who are concerned about honorable consistency now leave off twisting President Reagan's tail and give him the same

- THE NEW YORK TIMES.

Other Opinion

Seized Pawns in a Brutal Game

The biggest blunder of [Mr. Reagan's] presidency was his abortive peacekeeping effort in Lebanon, especially the shelling of Shiite villages when U.S. marines were under attack. The shelling generated some of the anti-Americanism that led to the present crisis, and might well have taught Mr. Reagan the limitations of armed forces in dealing with suicidal terrorists. There may be a time when retaliation can and should be inflicted with precision against lawless organizations. If so, the world can have greater confidence in Mr. Reagan's prudence for having watched him at this hour. — The Baltimore Sun.

It is incredible that Lebanon's justice minister should act as spokesman for the Shiites [while they hold] innocent airline passengers, - Aftenposten (Oslo).

Moderate or gangster? What do you have to do to become the strongman of Lebanon? Nabih Berri thinks he has found a triple response: Defy America, make Israel bend and show Syria that he is the master.

- Sud-Ouest (Bordeaux).

In Beirut the last pretenses have been dropped. Beirut airport has been hijacked, too, and the same could be said for all of Lebanon. - Information (Copenhagen).

To capitulate, as other countries have done, inevitably encourages new acts of terrorism. If the demand of [the hijackers] is met, then next week other American air travelers could be seized, and a still higher price demanded for their release. Blackmail is not a one-time thine. Pay it once, and it is certain that blackmailers will be back, again and again and again. The fate of the hostages remains a matter of urgent concern. But for now it is best seen as a problem, not a crisis, and it is a problem most wisely addressed by patience, by continued quiet efforts to win freedom for the hostages by restraining justifiable outrage. Above all, it is a problem to be faced while keeping American principles and interests always in sight. - The Los Angeles Times.

Neither Israel nor the United States could have mounted a successful raid, even with bombing cover, to rescue the hostages.

— The Sydney Morning Herald. Impotent frustration cannot last indefinitely in a country like the United States. At some point the impulse that prevails over every other consideration will be to strike blindly. — La Repubblica (Rome). Mr. Reagan learned during the martyrdom of Jimmy Carter that the president who makes it an issue of principle not to negotiate with terrorists entrenched in their own territory will see the days mount, the yellow ribbons flutter in the breeze and his own viscera extracted. Ronald Reagan can shrug off a few weeks of embarrassment at a climbdown; a continuous siege with the risk of death to the passengers [would] rot him half a grain a day.

- The Daily Telegraph (London).

Hype is probably the most common error in the treatment of terrorist actions by the media. Hostages are taken precisely in order to capture public opinion in ways that coerce governments. But to be successful what is merely an episode has to be escalated to crisis proportions. In sum, little is gained and much is lost when journalists deal with terrorism as if they were doing business as usual. There is an overwhelming case for self-discipline.

A SPEN, Colorado — President Reagan, who found it so easy to attack Jimmy Carter, now knows something about the frustrations of power in a hostage crisis. But in the course of adjusting to reality be may have missed the chance to free the passengers of TWA flight 847 at the lowest possible price.

That is the view of a man especially qualified to understand the hostage problem: Gary Sick, a former Navy captain, National Security Council specialist on Iran under Presidents Ford and Carter and author of the much praised new book "All Fall Down: America's Tragic Encounter With Iran."

The chance seen by Mr. Sick was to meet the terms asked by Nabih Berri, the Shiite leader who took responsibility for the hostages when they were removed from the plane in Beirut. Israel would release the 700 Shutes it detained in southern Lebanon and still holds, and Mr. Berri would deliver the hostages.

It would have been a painful bargain, but less painful than some in hostage situations. Washington had already said that the 700 were held illegally, and Israel was moving toward their release. Most Americans would have regarded it as one more terrorist swap and would not have held it against Mr. Reagan.

But that solution was probably available only briefly. Mr. Sick believes — for a day or two. The reason is Mr. Berri's position in the turmoil of Lebanon today.

Nabih Bern is a moderate by instinct, and not anti-American. His children and former wife live in Dearborn, Michigan, He has spent much time in America and still has a resident alien's green card. A leader like Mr. Berri must worry about trailing behind the fervor of his people. That may be why he moved into the hostage situation: to show that he was the leader. He could not afford to stand aside. The risk for any such figure is that, unless he gets results quickly, the radicals will take over from him and escalate demands. The model for that disaster was President Abolhassan Bani-Sadr of Iran, who wanted to settle the hostage crisis but was overtaken by the muliahs. On that analysis, it was essential press conference comments. He vir-tually forswore use of force while the hostages are held, implying that retribution might follow later.

"Time is working against us," Mr. Sick said when I spoke with him. Not only is Mr. Berri likely to be under pressure to escalate de-mands. Public opinion in Israel, already sensitive over last month's release of Palestinian prisoners in an exchange, may harden. American emotions may rise.

One can see why Mr. Reagan failed to act quickly. The realism demanded by responsibility was at war in him with a posture against terrorism. Both were on display in his press conference Tuesday night. He had to bear the frustration, he said, lest action kill innocent people. But he also said that "America will never make concessions to terrorists," an utterly unrealistic posian early settlement in Mr. Reagan's tion in a nasty world. Every govern-ment negotiates when its citizens' lives are at stake.

In the crucial first days of this affair, when Mr. Reagan was coming to grips with it, a strange and deplorable role was played by Henry Kissinger. He went on television to urge that there be "no negotia-tions and no concessions." Asked what then should be done, he said he was not up to date on intelligence but the president's men could surely think of "something." His irrespon-sibility was breathtaking. When he was in office, at a moment of high sensitivity he would have insisted on the greatest discretion and freedom from outside pressure.

There are human beings involved here, and a president cannot forget them. That is why an implicit arrangement with Nabih Berri is probably the least bad choice Mr. Reagan has — or had.

Every day of stalemate turns

How did the United States find itself in this position, and what can be done about these acts that put at risk the most valuable assets of any country — its citizens?

There is little new in these acts of terrorism presumably performed by zealots willing to give their lives for a cause. Martyrdom has deep historical roots that include causes regarded by our culture as good, as well as evil. What is different today is that large, powerful industrial states are increasingly vulnerable to these types of acts as society offers more and more points of potential leverage to would be terrorists. By Harlan K. Ullman rights, indeed the Constitution it-self, are levers that terrorists use against them. The media (even this article) provide a forum for terrorists and their propaganda. Media coverage is the terrorist's coin of the realm, and its scope partly defines the success or failure of the terrorgoals. Beyond that, through media coverage of their acts, terrorists can exert leverage against countries and leaders, possibly to the extent of causing them to fall. When the "Desert One" raid to rescue U.S. hostages in Iran failed, so did

President Jimmy Carter's chances for re-election. That is leverage. We must realize that events like the hijacking of flight 847 will con-tinue and probably expand into other areas that may be more frightening and truly more threatening.

What should be done? In conditions like the present ones, the elected government must be permitted to get on with the difficult business at hand with limited or muted help from critics. At some stage that condition need not apply, but not in the early stages.

• There must be serious public understanding of the need for covert operations, pro-emptive strikes and retaliation against those who threaten our system and our citizens through acts of terror. These steps grate against America's national character and its system of individual freedoms, yet without some ca-pability, including an expanded intelligence network to allow these options a chance of success, we will be virtually helpless in future acts of international terrorism. • Finally, we must understand that terrorist acts will continue. They are an unwanted and entirely wasteful side effect of a free, prosperous and potentially vulnerable society. This is no solace to hostages, present and future, or to their families. But patience must be a virtue. There are few other choices.

Gandhi and Reagan: An Understanding Is Progress

By Philip Geyelin

WASHINGTON — What with one thing or another, the world's most populous democracy has only occasionally cut much of a figure in the American consciousness or in U.S. policy preoccupations. India is no threat and no part of America's cultural heritage. It is South (as in North-South). It is poor and nonaligned. Any right-thinking cold warrior knows that the proper focus has to be East-West in the real world, and that right-thinking nations, wherever they are, must choose sides.

For those reasons and more, the U.S.-India relationship has ranged more often than not from distant to hostile in the nearly 40 years since India's independence. In his memoirs, Henry Kissinger described the encounters in 1971 between Richard Nixon and Indira Gandhi as "the two most unfortunate meetings Nixon had with any foreign leader.

When Mrs. Gandhi died at the hands of Sikh assassins last year, her untested 40-year-old son Rajiv suc-ceeded as prime minister. Only a few optimists thought much good would result for U.S.-Indian relations.

So how do you explain last week's extravaganza: the young prime minister's acclaimed address to a congressional joint session; the star-studded state dinner: President Reagan proclaiming this "the year of India": the gushing accounts of how well the two leaders "hit it off" in their talks? To begin with, you wait for the oohs and aahs to subside. You then proceed carefully, bearing in mind the trendy and transitory influence of modern communications on American interests and concerns. Even before the engaging young

Mr. Gandhi burst upon this town, India had been looming increasingly India had been looming increasingly large as entertainment ("Gandhi," "A Passage to India." "The Jewel in the Crown") and as tragedy: the mother's violent death, the Bhopal catastrophe. The "Festival of India" road show of Indian culture will be forming the propulation in the propulation of the pr feeding the vogue. India is "in." That is a good thing, India is too big and too important to U.S. security to be as little known or cared about as it has been by most Americans.

The bad thing would be to proceed from heightened awareness of India to heightened expectations — to en-gage, that is, in the popular fancy that somehow this newly discovered India can be "weaned away" from the Soviet Union. To insist on applying the East-West test to a developing relationship with the government of Mr. Gandhi would be to invite failute. With his cool, collected charm and

Hence the rationale for phy is taken into account, it can be said that last week's public and pri-U.S. military aid to Pakistan.

Mr. Gandhi professes to see neither the risk nor the rationale. That is, he is for settling the Afghanistan war but not for continuing the pressure on the Soviet Union that might provide some incentive for settlement. Or so it sounds now. The question is whether the relationship struck up with the Reagan administration will clear the way for something constructive later on. Prime Minister Gandhi conveyed an interest in acquiring ally make hinges on Mr. Gandhi's U.S. military technology, and may arms. That is just as well, given the likely congressional and/or administration reaction while he remains dependent for 70 percent of his weap-onry on the Soviet Union. But his interest in military high tech reflects a longer-term Indian goal. By becoming increasingly its own arms suppli-er, India lightens its dependence on whatever outside sources.

The second annual State Department study of UN voting patterns; required under legislation, is distressing, particularly if one tries to correlate U.S. assistance to other countries with their support of U.S. positions in the General Assembly.

First the good news.

First, the good news.
It is no surprise that Grenada has gravitated toward the United States since the American military action there in 1983. That year, under £ previous regime. Grenada supported the United States in the Assembly in less than one vote in five. In 1983, in 10 votes selected by the State Department as most important to U.S. interests, Grenada was not with the United States once. But in 1984 it sided with the United States 60 percent of the time. On key votes it refrained from voting against it, while choosing to abstain or be absent on six of the 10 most important issues. In 1984, Israel stood with the United States nearly 90 percent of the time. As for the NATO allies, Britain and West Germany were at America's side at least 80 percent of the time, and Belgium. Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Italy, France and Cana-da voted with the United States on more than 70 percent of all issues. From 1983 to 1984, France increased its support from 67.6 to 72.1 percent.

In 1983, El Salvador, a recipient of U.S. assistance, supported Washington on 70 percent of the key votes. In 1984, while overall it opposed the

The Turkish View Differs Regarding "A Second Chance for Papandreon and Some Allies" (June 15) by Andriana Terodiaconou:

Traditional Greek policy vis-à-vis Turkey is well known: to involve the United States and the Europeans on her side in her disputes with Turkey and tru to obtain their support for her unjust claims. The theme of a Turkish threat is used as a smokescreen. The allies are invited to make Turkey pay the price for improvement of their relations with Greece. The Republic of Cyprus was created in 1960 with the equal partnership of the two communities. As in a marriage, the political will of only one side could not have brought it about. The Cyprus problem did not start with the legitimate intervention of Turkey in 1974 but well before, when Greek Cyprious butchered 206 Turkish Cypriots, including women and children, on the night of Dec. 21, 1963, and evicted Turkish Cypriots from the government. Thereafter the Greek Cypriots continued a campaign to try to break Turkish Cypriot resistance against Enosis. Any solu-tion has to take all this into account. Nor has Turkey sought "a larger slice of the operational control pie in the Aegean." General Bernard Rogers, the NATO commander, made strenuous efforts in 1979 and 1980 to work out a modus vivendi between Turkey and Greece on the question of operational control in the Aegean. After three visits to both countries he finally obtained the agreement of the parties on a text known as the "Rogers plan." It is this agreement which enabled Greece to return to NATO but Andreas Papandreou rejected it as soon as he came to power be-cause he wanted to have operational control of the whole Aegean.

The Greek approach to other Aegean problems is the same; an expansionist mentality that sees the Aegean as a "Greek lake." If Greece today changed this approach and accepted the fact that there are high seas and international airspace in the Aegean, it would not be an exaggeration to say that all these problems could be settled in a matter of days. Being one of the two coastal states in the Aegean, Turkey has, like Greece, political, security and economic interests in this sea. What Turkey seeks in the Aegean is just a fair share

AYHAN KAMEL, Ambassador of Turkey. The Hague.

A letter from the Greek Cypriot ambassador to France (May 2) distorted the facts about Cyprus. Media coverage of the Jan. 17 summit meet-ing in New York between Spyros Kypriance and Rauf Denktash contradicts the statement that the Greek Cypriot government acted with goodwill whereas the Turkish side raised obstacles. The Greek Cypriot House of Representatives criticized Mr. Ky-prianou for not cooperating with the United Nations secretary-general.

The Turks' 1963 rejection of the constitution's revision is not evidence of a Turkish "separatist philosophy." Archbishop Makarios's purpose in amending the constitution was to es-tablish his absolute authority over Cyprus and pave the way toward En-osis, something which was clearly un-acceptable for the Turks. The then valid Cyprus constitution was based on international agreements. The Zurich and London agreements establishing the Republic of Cyprus in 1960 had been the result of hard bargaining, exhausting discussions and give-and-take arrangements. The ambassador should know that such agreements are not to be signed one day and amended the next.

The Turks did not withdraw from the government but were ejected. Government security forces ran-

STOCKHOLM - General election campaigns in Sweden usually do not begin until late summer and often they are low-key. But for sev-eral weeks, the ruling Social Democrats and the conservative opposition parties have been battling over the issue that is expected to dominate the voting on Sept. 15: whether or not to reform the welfare state

Most political and diplomatic observers and polls predict that it will be one of the closest elections

An example of the campaign tac-tics was reflected in a series of controversial spot commercials currently being projected in movie theaters throughout the country. One shows a distraught youngster in his school cafeteria unable to pay for his hunch; another, filmed in the emergency room of a Swed-ish hospital, shows an embarrassed mother searching her pocketbook for cash, while her bleeding son waits for treatment and a doctor glowers impatiently. For decades, medical care and school lunches have been provided free of charge. The message being conveyed by the sponsoring Social Democrats is that the conservative parties, if re-turned to power, would transform Sweden into "an egotistical society, for economic reasons." Some party officials and even Aftonbladet, a leading pro-government daily newspaper, have criticized the films as embarrassing and vulgar. Many young viewers in Stockholm reacted with laughter. A conservative leader termed it "scare tactics."

Meanwhile, in the center of Stockholm and other major cities last week, young volunteers from conservative parties proposed bumper stickers to passing motor-ists bearing an equally strong mes-sage — the need to immediately dismantle mion-controlled wageearner funds established by leftist government in 1983. What Lies Ahead for the Welfare State?

UPPSALA - On Sept. 15 there will be elections in Sweden, both to the Riksdag, the parliament, and to local and provincial councils. The outcome is most uncertain.

Until recently opinion polls indicated a win for the non-Socialist parties, so that Prime Minister Olof Palme would have to resign; one of the latest polls has given him a narrow majority. But they all agree on one point: more than 8 percent of the voters are as yet undecided. This reflects the dilemma of contemporary Swedish

The welfare state in the accepted sense was established under Social Democratic rule, especially in the decade just before and the two decades just after World War II. It came to be repenally accepted that the state had collective responsibilities in the social field. Poverty, as previously defined, was made to disappear. The average standard of living rose steeply and became one of the highest in the world. Presperity was more and more evenly distributed.

This was made possible by high productivity and rapidly growing exports. Economically, the Wages of its members should be pro-gressively equalized. But now, in 1985, the presi-dent of the Meal Workers' Union, in many respects the most important of its constituent bodies, has come out with a statement arguing that there should be an end to equalization between members. Instead, the aim should be to reduce the wage differential in relation to salaried white-collar employees. And trusted Social Democrats in the administration do their best to raise the salaries of higher civil servants to a level comparable to those of senior executives in private industry even though this increases the salary differential within the public sector.

It now appears doubtful whether there will be any increases in prosperity to distribute. Distriition policies can then no longer be made to Bothering to the Social Democrats is the fact that recent polls show that the conservative parties could win the election, largely because of growing support among Swedish youth and white-collar workers for Ulf Adelsohn, the 44year-old head of the Moderate Party. He not only has vigorously called for reducing Sweden's tax levels, the highest among industrialized countries, but has openly challenged the powerful role of the state in Swedish society.

Mr. Adelsohn said that many of his views are similar to those of Jacques Chirac, the Neo-Gaullist leader and former prime minister of France, who is calling for widesprend deregulation of the French economy. "Our message seems to be getting across here, judging from the enthusiastic reactions," the Swedish political leader said.

A senior U.S. diplomatic official described what is happening in Sweden as "American-style polarization" of politics, mainly because of Mr. Adelsohn's aggressive style. Mr. Malm predicted renewed, personal attacks against Mr. Palme and his ministers, some of whom have been severely criticized by opposition leaders in variament. An "affair" frequently cited was the vote of no-confidence against Foreign Minister Lennart Bodström, which was defeated by the leftist majority in February. The charges by opposition leaders clearly implied that the government was unable to cope with the dangers of Soviet violations of Swedish waters and air space and had damaged Sweden's traditional peutrality.

Defense Minister Anders Thurborg has said he plans to resign after the elections but denied this was linked to "the Bodström affair." Although conservative lead-ers plan to cite the two cases and to attack Mr. Palme's leadership during the campaign, foreign policy, notably Sweden's neutrality, is not expected to be an issue.

"Mr. Palme is controversial, but we do not disagree with the Social Democrats on foreign policy." said Ingemar Eliasson, deputy chairman of the Liberal Party and labor minister in the previous, conserva-tive government of Thorbjörn Fälidin, who has remained leader of the Center Party.

A Timely Consensus On Security Policy

By Michael Metcalfe

STOCKHOLM -- A report on Swedish security policy submit-ted to the Riksdag, the Swedish parliament, by a parliamentary defense committee last month noted that the report had been unanimously adopted by all political parties represented in the

This serves to demonstrate the important fact that there is broad consensus in Sweden on the basic features of our security policy," said the committee chairman, Gunnar Nilsson, a Social Democrat and former leader of the labor union federation.

The report, reflecting all-party unity in security policy, is timely. Based on the premise of "nonadherence to alliances in peacetime aiming at neutrality in war," Swedish security policy rests, or falls, on the cornerstone of preserving, and being seen to pre-serve, a high level of military prearedness. Sandwiched as it is between opposing forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Warsaw Pact, Sweden, together with neutral Finland, acts as a military buffer to preserve the strategic status quo in the Nordic region. Swedish territory is of immense strategic importance, since it occupies an exposed position between the Arctic and the Baltic Sea outlets, military attaches of Western embassies in Stockholm

"If its level of military preparedness and its degree of watchfulness are ever thrown into doubt, the threat arises of the delicate halance between East and West being upset and height-ening the threshold of tension in the region," one diplomat said.

The presence of a stranded Soviet submarine in Swedish territorial waters in October 1981 and repeated incursions of Warsaw Pact submarines have raised questions about the level of Swedish security credibility, as well as gone to the heart of its policy of neutrality.

The diplomatic row that followed between Stockholm and Moscow highlighted and threw into jeopardy Sweden's position as a confidence bridge-builder between East and West.

neuvers in northern Sweden.

The tangible evidence of a Soviet submarine thought to have been carrying nuclear weapons in Swedish waters, together with less tangible but no less disturbing proof of further foreign subma-rine intrusions in the Stockholm archipelago a year later, brought home to Swedes how exposed and isolated they could be.

The submarine episodes came just as recession and budget deficits were restricting Swedish military spending and encouraging calls for cuts in military forces. Swedish military expenditure remains large. According to the 1985-1986 budget, the defense minister, Anders Thunborg, plans to spend more than 25 bil-lion kronor ($2.84 billion) in the year up to June 1986 in the area

The main aim of total defense, according to the government, "is to be so well prepared for war that it serves to maintain peace." Possessing no nuclear deterrent and relying on conventional forces to ward off aggressors, Sweden's total security concept is crucial to its strategy.

Despite rationalization measures and cost-saving, Sweden has managed to keep its military spending at about 3.5 percent of gross national product each year, roughly comparable to West Germany, France and Norway.

While the level of military spending remains broadly unchanged, the degree of emphasis has shifted slightly in favor of improving Sweden's antisubmarine warfare capability and its early-warning systems. Defense Ministry officials said.

The case of the Soviet Whiskyclass submarine's presence near Kariskrona navai base, one of the country's most sensitive military installations, revealed loopholes in the early-warning system.

During the period 1982 to 1987, about 1.2 billion kronor has been earmarked to bolster antisubmarine warfare. New types of torpedoes and depth charges for use specifically in the Baltic have been developed, and plans to add four new minesweepers and four helicopters specially equipped with high-frequency sonar to bunt for mine-submarines and other submerged objects have been speeded up.

The air force has problems of its own. Its squadrons of Viggen and Draken fighters are aging and the scheduled replacement of a large number of these by a new multirole combat aircraft code named JAS-39, while on time, remains far off in the late 1990s.

The JAS project, tying up more than 25 billion kronor at constant, 1981 prices, takes a large slice of the military budget, although the effort and the magnitude of the funds at stake are deemed vital to Sweden's future air-defense capa-

But its neutrality policy obliges it also not to ignore the interests of the Soviet Union, an observer said.

The difficulty was evident in 1983, when customs officials at the southern Swedish port of Helsingborg discovered that U.S.-manufactured computers were being shipped illegally via South-Africa and Sweden to the Soviet Union. The principle of "wage solidarity" was applied, aimed at closing the gap between low and high wage grades, as well as ensuring equal pay for equal work in all industries.

Centralized wage talks broke down in 1984, when the employers'

But the appearance of labor market harmony was quickly shattered by a nearly three-week-long whitecollar, public-employees strike in May. The strike got international attention by cutting off all air con-nections with Sweden and stopping most international trade due to walkouts by airport personnel and customs inspectors.

"The problems for Sweden is that we have organizations on the labor market that are very strong, and especially, the public-sector inbor organizations do not have the same feeling for the importance of pressing down wage increases as there is in the private sector," said Lillemor Thalin, an economist and vice president of Svenska Handels-

THE MOTORING JOURNAL "WHAT CAR?" HAS CHOSEN THE BEST DIRECTORS CAR FOR 1985

Be one of the few to have Saab's stunner.

"Because of its unique combination of phenomenal performance, driver appeal and sheer practicality it thoroughly deserves its first place status."

That's what the people at the British magazine What Car? said in their April issue when they chose the Saab 900 Turbo 16S as the "Best Directors Car" for 1985. (In America, this dazzling car is referred to as the Saab 900 Turbo 16 SPG, Special Performance Group.)

This really didn't come as a great surprise to us at Saab. We already knew that the 900 Turbo 16S was a terrific car, but it's nice that some other people think so also.

What Car?'s recognition is just another indication that the winning Saab product concept has made our turbo cars into frontrunners for people in the lead who intend to remain there.

The Third Generation Turbo
One thing's certain, the Saab 900 Turbo 16S is not a car

It's for people who have a little bit of Charles Lindbergh or the Red Baron in their blood. That's because the 900 Turbo 16S has a little bit of Saab's aircraft in it. Aerodynamics. Precision engineering.

Man-machine interaction. All-weather dependability.

Under the hood of this turbo lies a power plant that is an advanced stage of the evolution of the internal combustion engine.

While other manufacturers are busy producing their initial turbos, we have developed our third generation turbo engine.

This evolutionary piece of technology has a turbocharger with intercooler, double overhead camshafts and an advanced microprocessor-controlled fuel injection system that gives the 16-valve engine explosive power in virtually any RPM. And Saab's patented Automatic Performance Control system (APC) is included to guarantee that you get the power you demand from the fuel you choose.

But engine efficiency is only one part of the story. With the third generation turbo engine, the main part of the story is performance.

The 900 Turbo 16S offers breathtaking performance. The engine delivers 175 bhp along with 273 Nm torque, and the car likes to show it off. It does the 0–100 kilometer sprint in only 8.7 seconds. And with its sleek aerodynamic design, its top speed exceeds 200 km/h.

Performance with flair

The 900 Turbo 16S not only performs outstandingly, it also feels great. Its design advances the state of the art in man-machine interaction. It features special aerodynamic fairings, front and rear stabilizer bars, specially-tuned shock absorbers, high-speed V-rated radial tires, leather seats, electric sun roof and fog lights.

And with its sleek design, the 900 Turbo 16S is as stunning to look at as it is to drive.

Glass Leaves the Cottage for the Industrial Plant

KOSTA — "Glass has its own will," said Anna Ehrner, one of the designers at Kosta Boda, Sweden's largest glass producer. The observation applies with equal force to Swedsh design overall.

Whether in glass, silver, ceramics, textiles, furniture or industrial design. Sweden has fashioned a special place for itself in contemporary international design.

Whereas Swedish design internationally is judged as being synonymous with Scandinavian design, it has developed its own line of direction.

As Ake Huldt, organizer of a current exhibition of Swed-ish glass at the Swedish Cultural Center in Paris, said recently: "The variations of Scandinavian design have come to be regarded in the world as dialects of the same language." (The exhibition, entitled "Un Art du Feu," is at the Centre Culturel Suédois, 11 rue Payenne, to July 14.)

But just as each of the countries making up the Nordic region possesses its own language quite distinct from that of its neighbors, so design in each is distinguished by its own Stating its neighbors, so design in each is distinguished by its own speech patterns and terms of reference.

Denmark is eager to keep furniture and silver as national design motives; Finland leads in textiles and jewelry; Norway derives its strength from industrial design and wood products, and Sweden loves its glass.

"I think Swedish glass has a special place in the hearts of Swedes as a national treasure," said Mr. Huldt, who has collected some 150 pieces from 24 artists for the Paris exhibition.

At Kosta, a small tranquil town skirted by woods in the heartland of Sweden's Smaland province, in the southeast corner of the country, it is easy to see why. The factory outside the town houses a glittering treasure trove of glass dating to 1742, when Kosta was founded as a glassmaking community.

Since then, its fine crystal, its skillful engravers and polishers have carved out a unique name in the field of decorative glass, matched perhaps only by Orrefors, another leading Swedish glass manufacturer.

But companies, like glass, fuse. In the mid-1960s, Kosta merged with Afors, which, with designer Bertil Vallien, had as its specialty everyday table glass. It later joined with Boda, which had focused on experimentation under designer Erik Hogland. Orrefors ceased being a family business in 1971, becoming part of a larger conglomerate.

"These ownership relations have their interest, since they also affect production and design," said Katja Walden, author and translator, now chief of information at the Swedish Cultural Center in Paris. "The glass produced by Kosta Boda now is a part of stocks covering objects for the whole table, in glass and porcelain."

The emphasis has now switched from a cottage industry to a large- scale industrial operation focused on increasing exports, Miss Walden said.

Most Swedish glass is produced in a small area in Smaland, where fewer than 20 glass companies are active, employing some 2,500 workers. The largest is Kosta Boda. followed by Orrefors. The others employ between 20 and 200

At the Paris exhibition, one can view some of the best examples of contemporary Swedish glass design from Kosta Boda, Orrefors and the independent smaller companies. ceramist and sculptor, is one of the founders of the "new" Swedish glass. Mixing techniques and colors, often in the same glass, his forms are sand--blasted expressions of organic growth molded by spontaneity and strictness Stating his view of the designer's task at Kosta Boda, Mr. Vallien said: "Free experimentation is often called. by the managers, playing around, but that is decidedly the wrong expression. Freedom to experiment with forms and materials is absolutely necessary and extremely serious. It is our form of but rather is a single important facet in the overall picture."

Design in Sweden runs in two directions. First, there is the interest in utility goods, to give good shape and form to ordinary household items; secondly, there is the movement to freely express artistic values in materials such as glass, silver and wood, which has become known as "industrial days, things are becoming more and more specialized." One example of this trend in Sweden is design for the disabled. Here, the team of Maria Benktzon and Sven-Eric

The Stockholm-based team designed, for example, a kitchen knife with an extra high blade, good balance and new grip for hands afflicted by rheumatoid arthritis or similar muscular disabilities.

The link between form and function is omnipresent in Swedish design, whether in the field of furniture, textiles, ceramics or silverware. Furniture designers Borge Lindau and Bo Lindekrantz, for example, like to combine materials and functions in Other problems also rise to the surface. The elfare state is, by definition, interventionist. and perfect egalitarianism calls for even more intervention. Swedes have been criticized by foreign observers for being excessively docile in face of such tendencies. But there may be a limit even to their patience. Freedom, as opposed to regimentation, has again become a popular watchword. This troubles the Social Democrats, who reply with the argument that no real freedom is possible without security and equality.

Taxes — especially direct taxes — are higher in Sweden than in other countries. Their impact is felt not only by "the rich" but also very much by such "ordinary people" as skilled workers and clerical employees. Swedes are still ready to work rather hard, but quite a number of them would apparently prefer to keep a greater part of their earnings for use according to their stopped for three weeks. Swedish exports have benefited from three major devaluations of the currency as well as from the rate of exchange of the U.S. dollar. The latest devaluation, at the advent of the Social Democratic government in 1982, was of 16 percent. It was, however, not followed up by vigorous austerity measures, and the effect is now wearing off. There are even those who say that another devaluation may prove necessary, although the size of the latest one was justified by assurances that nothing of the sort would er take place again.

to reduce public expenditure even to the point of affecting some social benefits, and they would probably try to sell out some publicly owned enterprises. They are also pledged to abolish the wage-earner funds immediately. I this happens, it might well be final. It is doubtful whether Social Democrats, if they came backet into power later, would ever try to resuscitate this highly unpopular plan.

But sooner or later there is considerable risk that Sweden will lose its traditional parliamentary stability - and for a considerable time. There may again be frequent changes of government, with the result that no policies can be planned for a longer period than until the next

When Social Democrats talk of getting away from "bloc politics" they have in mind In fact, it could be argued that it does not make too much difference which party is in power. For its part, the government has in the past focused most of its efforts and resources on the task of restructuring troubled sectors through direct support measures. such as subsidies, soft loans and capital injections. The task of indirectly promoting new sectors and growing industries through financial incentives and channeling private savings into fresh investments is relatively new.

Whether the present government will have the chance of furthering this industrial policy depends on the electorate's judgment in September.

The ghosts of union leaders and industrialists of the 1930s are hard to find in this tourist spot of the mid-1980s; so is the model, which, nearly 47 years later, appears to have been laid to rest.

What happened? According to economists, the model centered on centralized wage bargaining in periods of economic growth, which ensured an unbroken record of labor-management peace based on consensus and no government intervention.

With the slip into recession at the beginning of this decade, the decline in corporate profitability and the threat of scarcer jobs combined to erode the pillars of the model, which collapsed under the weight

Lower Lending Ceiling Cuts Banking Profitability

STOCKHOLM — For Swedish banking, 1985 started as a mediocre year that turned much worse on May 13, when the central bank, Sveriges Riksbank, as part of an austerity package, sharply boosted interest rates and lowered the ceiling on new lending for the year.

With bank earnings already weakening, the rate hikes, aimed at sharply reducing private consumption and reversing private capital outflows, could mean that Swedish bank profitability will plummet rather than simply decline in 1985. However, the interest-rate hikes were described as temporary and may not last through the rest of the

the Stockholm stock market, when the exchange mestic saver to enter the market. sailed into record prices and turnover, have

The pace of trading, frequently frenetic during the past four years, has relented and in its place has come a more sober attitude reflected in a degree of caution toward market trading and performance.

"The level of activity is relatively low at the moment and what seemed a good opening to the year has turned into a very nervous situation," said the new president of the stock exchange. Bengt Redin, who took office late last year.

Since 1980, when the boom got under way, a deluge of foreign and domestic investor demand had burst upon this sedate exchange, housed in a 16th-century building in the heart of Stockholm's old quarter.

The surge in trading took Stockholm to eighth place in the ranking of the world's leading exchanges, boosting its equity turnover from an annual 1.5 billion Swedish kronor ($169 million) at the end of the 1970s to more than 70 billion kronor by the end of 1984.

While the Social Democratic government has ing the market less attractive to the Swedish investor, the foreign presence has remained and even strengthened.

"The presence of foreign investor interest has been the only stabilizing factor keeping the market ticking over in the past couple of months," said Anders Klintorph, head of international trading at the Swedish stockbrokers, Richard Hagglofs Fondkommission.

The level of net share purchases in the first four months of 1985 was around 2.4 billion kronor, with the bulk of buying coming in January and February, a steep rise compared with the 1.1 billion kronor over the same period last year, Mr. Klintorph estimated.

An Operatic Dinosaur Gets a New Lease on Life

ARIS — A contemporary critic thought the libretto was "awfully stupid," the composer's music has been almost completely out of fashion for a century, and the work itself has not beenseen here since 1893, but despite all this — or perhaps because of it — Monday's revital of Giacomo Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable" by the Paris Opera is one of the mostly hotty anticipated dates in the operattimed the alle Laboration by the state of the ic cliendar of recent seasons.

Yet the worldwide interest in this event is The to more than mere antiquarianism. Meyerber, born Jakob Liebmann Beer to a weilthy Jewish family in Berlin in 1791, is considered the founder (or at least the cleveiest exploite;) of what is normally under-stood as grand opera, and "Robert le Dia-ble," which created a furor at its Paris premiere in 1831, was the composer's first effort in this line. Furthermore, the celebrated ballet in Act 3 is considered by many dance historians to be the starting point of Romantic ballet. Paris was the capital of the operatic world at the time and French grand opera became the dominant style for decades; not even Wagner and Verdi escaped At a time when the resuscitation of forgotten works and research in performing styles have become specialties, the Romantic era has not been much favored. True, there was a mild Meyerbeer comeback in the 1960s, "Les Huguenots" (1836) had a star-studded revival at Milan's La Scala and a respectable provincial one in Rouen; "Le Prophète" (1849) was exhumed in Zurich and later at New York's Metropolitan, and "L'Africia" (1865) was reconstructed in Metropolitan. caine" (1865) was produced in Munich. But "Robert le Diable" seems to have had only a severely cut concert performance in Florence in 1968, in Italian, and a recording of it

Paris, where it all began, did not join in. Georges Auric, who directed the Opera in the 1960s, when asked once about the possibility of a Meyerbeer revival, visibly shudhis programming.

Meyerbeer, with a solid German musical education under his belt, moved to Italy in 1816, Italianizing his name and acquiring, chameleon-like, a talent for producing operas in the current Rossinian style. Ten years later he moved to Paris, embarked on a methodical study of French opera and entered into a contract to compose an opéra comique in three acts entitled "Robert le Diable." The principal librettist was Engène Scribe, master artisan of the "well-made" play, proprietor of a veritable opera-libretto factory, and perhaps the most influential figure on the Parisian operatic scene in the mid-19th century.

EANWHILE, the ground was being laid for the appearance of grand opera. The ingredients included the traditional French taste for theatrical specta-cle and the shift from opera as court entertainment to an appeal to a bourgeois public. some of its early manifestations were the phemeral patriotic spectacles of the Revolutionary and Napoleonic periods, "rescue" operas such as Cherubini's "Les Deux Jours" and Beethoven's "Fidelio," and preliminary steps toward 19th-century grand opera in such large-scale works as Spontini's Fernand Cortez" and "La Vestale."

The growing Romantic spirit called for emotionally charged plots, historical or pseudo-historical situations blending into legend, the invocation of nature and the supernatural (sometimes mingled with genteel croticism), striking contrasts and theat-rical effects, colorful orchestration, the dramatic use of choral masses, and growing demands on the vocal prowess of singers.

A list of early French grand opera has to include "Moise," Rossini's 1827 adaptation of one of his earlier Italian operas; "La Muette de Portici" by Daniel-François Au-ber (book by the ubiquitous Scribe), which racked up 100 performances in less than year after its premiere in 1828, and helped ignite a revolution when performed in Brussels in 1830; and Rossini's "Guillaume Tell," which had a triumphal success in 1829.

Meyerbeer knew a trend when he saw one, and somewhere in here the "Robert le Diable" project changed from a three-act opéra comique to a five-act grand opera. After its enormous success, Auber returned to a prolific career in opera comique (almost always in collaboration with Scribe), while Rossini went into a well earned retirement from the operatic grind,

The complex and silly libretto, inspired by a medieval tale, has Robert, the Faust-like duke of Normandy, arriving in Sicily to seek the hand of Princess Isabelle. He is accom-panied by Bertram, a demon who is the father of Robert by a human mother and who keeps trying to win his offspring for the powers of evil. In the end Robert is saved from this fate by his foster sister, Alice, and he weds Isabelle. The most celebrated scene, however, is the ballet in the third act in which Bertram summons from their tomb: the spirits of nuns who betrayed their vows, seeking to enlist them in seducing Robert.

The success of "Robert" was due, besides Meyerbeer's music, to a singular combination of factors and characters. There was the Opéra's director, Dr. Louis Véron, a shrewd judge of his bourgeois audience and its tastes and the person most responsible for creating the five-act grand spectacle as a theatrical form. Under him, as production director, was Charles-Edmond Duponchel, an architect and decorator of high-society shindigs. who had a corresponding taste for superproductions and a penchant for romantic historical re-creation. Duponchel sent the designer, Pierre Ciceri, to study the architecture of monastic ruins, and the set he designed for the nun's ballet is variously said to be based on Saint-Trophime, near Arles, or the cloister at Montfort l'Amaury, near

The Opéra cast "Robert le Diable" from strength, as it did all of Meyerbeer's operus. but the most distinctive singer in the cast was the tenor Adolphe Nourrit in the title role. Nourrit, by all accounts, was a stylish and elegant singer who excelled in the use of his head voice and what the French call voixmixte, but he was far more than that. A cultivated and intelligent man, he frequently wrote the words for parts of his roles and took an active role in staging of works he was in — some sources credit him with the stage direction of the premiere of "Robert le Dia-

The Founding Mothers of Dance

by Anna Kisselgoff

One of Degas's paintings with the ballet scene.

EW YORK — "I aim to speak the language of humanity, not the dialect of a folk." The founding mothers of modern dance in America were prone to making such pro-nouncements and this statement, typically, came from the mother of them all, Isadora Duncan. Just as typically and in the same interview with The San Francisco Examiner in 1917, Isadora felt compelled to declare where her "center of inspiration" lay. As the reporter indicated, she placed her hand on her breast and then on her brow. For Isadora, the source of movement was in the solar plexus. Later, in the 1930s, the phrase fall and recovery" would be identified with the movement principles of Doris Hum-phrey just as "contraction and release" would be identified with Martha Graham. A premise about movement became a basis for a dance technique in each case and, by extension, became a metaphor for an aesthetic - for what each dancer wished to say through her dancing. The general principle was, as Humphrey wrote in 1927, "that of moving from the inside out — it's the dominant expression of our generation, if not of the age, and ballet is as out of style as bustles and leg o'mutton sleeves.' We don't hear talk like this nowadays and it is hard perhaps for us today to recapture the assertiveness of the modern-dance pioneers and their immediate disciples, many of whom are still active. Two ideas need to be considered. One is these dancers' belief that an individual's own body could be the source for an entire new form of artistic expression. It e second is that this individualism would in short, there was a pervasive idealism about early modern dance that hardly seems evident today. It is true that this viewpoint might look naive in some respects. But it was not put forward by naive artists. Duncan, who died in 1927, could gush. But she was well read, well educated in art and music and at the center of creative currents in all the arts. Humphrey, who died in 1958, was — like Graham — trained at the school of Isadora's counterparts, Ruth St. Denis and Ted Shawn, and was a pioneer in her analytic approach to classical music.

To the first modern dancers, the new ways of dancing were universal in expression because, in part, they had reaffirmed anatomical truths about the body. The difference between perfect balance and yielding to gravity created drama obvious to anyone, as Humphrey knew. The contraction and rease in the Graham technique was an amplification of the mechanism of breathing that is, common to all.

"Contraction and release" could be incorporated into a new dance idiom that was percussive and sharp. "Fall and recovery" could create a shift of weight that would affect not only isolated dancers but the way an ensemble looked — the entire stage pic-ture. The body-centered ballet vocabulary no longer needed to be the norm in theatrical dancing.

The idioms of the modern dancers did not consist only of movements based on such principles. But what these dancers seemed to saying was that the norm in dancing was actually found in physical laws applicable to everyone, while ballet sought an artificial (if highly efficient) use of the body. The individual was everyman — that is, humanity. And humanity's lot was dance's concern.

Pen drawings of Isadora Duncan by Jean-Paul Lafitte (c. 1909).

The days are over when a debate over how the body moves is the prime issue. Nor is Isadora's Whitmanesque "I See America Dancing" manifesto finding its echo in cur-rent aesthetic concerns. There are socialprotest dances and dances critical of society. But the harmony-after-conflict that Humphrey might promulgate in her works finds no equivalent today. There are no images of Utopia, of ideal societies. Isadora's visions of healthy children skipping hand in hand toward happiness or of allegorical figures are replaced for the most part by sardonic or ironic pieces. These are heavily systematized or cerebral in their concepts.

ACH age begets its own creative spirit and obviously an America that has lost its innocence cannot be the same as it was in the first half of the century. Yet it is worth recalling that the early modern dancers also lived in turbulent times. Isadora's personification of the "Marseillaise" was a call to French patriotism, a response to World War L and her most dramatic dances were infused with her enthusiasm for the Russian Revolution. Internal upheaval was certainly the stimulus for Humphrey, Charles Weidman and Graham when they left Denishawn to express what they felt in what proved to be more contemporary terms. It is pertinent to recall that they did their major work in the midst of the Depression and the New Deal.

The point is that no matter how clearly they saw the disasters of the times, they identified with the values of a society around them that promised resolution. Graham vanquished bigotry, Puritanism and conformity in her pieces; Humphrey put strife and conflict through a prism in which good won out over evil. Interestingly, even in an age of Works Progress Adminstration murals, modern dance's early exponents often turned to a strain of lyricism — not the machine-dances one could have expected.

Lyricism is out of fashion nowadays, and perhaps that is why it was startling to see how much it dominated an especially interesting recent concert here that included works by various modern-dance pioneers. The guiding lights were Lori Belilove, who has done very well as a Duncan exponent, and Evelyn Shepard, to whom Pauline

Koner has entrusted the performance of her solos. The program included Humphrey's "Day on Earth" and several Duncan pieces that have been revived in recent years. There was also "Les Funerailles" to music by Liszt, a solo Isadora danced at a memorial service for the French actress Réjane. Belilove and her teacher, Julia Levien, reconstructed it freely from various sources. At best, it seemed an exercise "in the style of" Isadora.

Koner's 1953 "Cassandra," Anna Sokolow's Rachmaninoff premiere Two Pre-ludes," and Eleanor King's 1970 "Enthou-siasmos" to Bartók were the most recent works on the program. The latter was vi brantly danced by Belilove — a Hellenized bacchante, skipping uninhibitedly with a tambourine and then turning into a snake charmer, with the "snake" around her neck.

King was a charter member of the Humphrey-Weidman company from 1928 to 1935 and her memoirs, "Transformations" (Dance Horizons), offer a revealing picture of an art form in the midst of self-definition. King, who left New York in the mid-1940s for Seattle, was not considered one of modern-dance's giants, but the early solos on this program reflect the form and aesthetic she absorbed from them. She writes that her "Song of Earth" (1933) to an arrangement of an English sheep-shearing song by Eugene Goosens, borrowed its opening stance legs apart, torso bent over — from Breughel's "Reapers." Belilove's heavy plunging gestures and her sinking to floor signaled a peasant's affinity for the earth - and modern dance's love affair with floorwork. When she rose into a profile with one arm curved, she did so impressively within one phrase. "Mother of Tears" (1933) is King's other best-known solo. Here again, Belilove began bent, rooted to a spot. The music is by Herman Reutter, a German composer killed in World War I, and the impression is of a Dürer woodcut. The movements are sharp and the virgin weeps in one simple gesture with cupped hands before sinking into a twisted form. Despite the derogatory charge of "self-expression" often hurled at modern dance, these solos showed the opposite. King saw them as dances of life and death. Certainly, they eschew literalism and they are surprisingly abstract.

Murano Makes a Comeback

by Kate Singleton

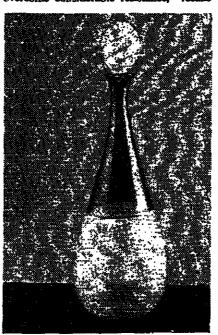

ENICE — If you think of modern Murano blown glass as meaning those tawdry ashtrays, doorstops, paperweights, gondolas, animals and assorted pewgaws that lure tourists into the shops of Venice, you are mistaken. Recent developments in Murano are showing that the kitschy image of its age-old craft amounts to little more than an embarrassing interlude in an otherwise glorious tradition.

The glories of the blown glass of the past can be admired in the Museo Vetrario, the glass museum in Murano, a 30-minute vaporetto ride from San Marco. It was refurbished with perfect simplicity a few years ago: well selected objects from a 500-year span, displayed to their best advantage in the bright Venetian daylight. Now a new and separate section of the museum, dedicated entirely to 20th-century Murano glass, has just been opened nearby. It holds a permanent collection of modern blown glass and an exhibition of contemporary products that will be changed twice a year. The museum is the most striking sign of the renaissance taking place in the world of Murano glass. Both the new museum and the rebirth of the craft are the outcome of far-sighted collaboration between local authorities and a handful of Murano glass firms led by two enterprising brothers, Giovanni and Carlo Moretti of the Carlo Moretti company.

"The situation here ten years ago was dismal," recalls Giovanni Moretti, whose family has been in the glass business for generations. "Quality output was rare, and the shoddy stuff that had kept a number of firms going was being edged out of the market by manufacturers in Taiwan." Large factories had to shut down, unemployment became a problem, and the master glassblowers reaching retirement age found there were no youngsters prepared to learn a craft that didn't seem to offer much future. The Morettis felt that the only way out was to pool ideas and initiate some collective action. Along with 11 other firms, in 1975 they founded the Consortium for the Promotion of Venetian Artistic Glass. "We had to overcome considerable resistance," recalls

"La Fenice" carafe.

Moretti "Cartoccio" glass.

Giovanni. "Relations between the various firms weren't good and people tended to have a self-defeating, insular outlook. It all took a lot of persuasion."

There are 53 glass companies in the consortium today, and their coordinated efforts have reversed the downward trend of the 1960s and early '70s. Their VM - Vetro Murano — mark has come to be recognized as a guarantee of authenticity, quality and traditional production techniques. Employment is once more stable (around 2,000 employees), and in 1984 sales of Murano glass injected $50 million into the local ecomomy. That 55 percent of this was in exports shows that the consortium's promotional efforts abroad are bearing fruit. In collaboration with the Venice Chamber of Commerce and the Italian Institute of Foreign Trade, they arranged shows of contemporary Murano glass in London and Düsseldorf in 1984. A show is scheduled for Paris in October this year, and Bloomingdale's in New York will have a large glass section in its Italian design week in September. For the Murano firms, the U.S. market is particularly promising. In the first half of 1984, sales there showed an increase of 95 percent over the previous semester. Americans seem to be moving away from the showy, ornate lamps and vases they once went for and choosing glass that embodies first-class design instead. This is exactly what the Moretti brothers hoped would happen. Their firm produces up-market designer glass (Carlo designs all their output) using traditional craft methods and a few carefully guarded inventions that allow them to increase production while maintaining quality. Other flourishing companies such as Salviati, Venini, Barovier & Toso, Mazzega or

VeArt may work with a number of different designers, including outsiders, but they all aim at individual objects of superb craftsmanship and the best Italian design. The ideal customer is discriminating and reasonably wealthy, "rather as he must have been in the past," says Carlo Moretti.

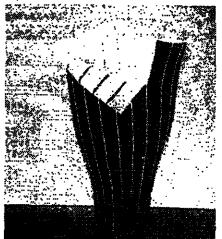

The new section of the museum was really set up to give luster and a sort of imprimatur to modern Italian glass design. The building was bought, restructured and fitted out by a group of 10 Murano firms who lease it at a nominal rent to the Venice Municipality Arts Board. An advisory committee was formed to select the works shown in the temporary display. All Murano glass companies, consortium members or otherwise, were invited to submit up to 10 objects.

The 50 pieces on show on the ground floor of the museum are the outcome of the selection. Most of the works were designed during the last three years and are varied in form, function and decorative techniques. The idea is that when you succumb to temptation and buy that extraordinary black vase that is slit at the rim and folded back to reveal the different colored glass on the inner side (from the "Gli Spacchi" series designed by Toni Zuccheri for Barovier & Toso), or those strangely surreal flasks with their disconcertingly suggestive stoppers in pale fume blown glass (called "Zefiro," designed by Luciano Gaspa for Salviau), or the "Cartoccio" wine glasses designed by Carlo Mor-etti (your guests may not know which side to drink from, but it is beautiful tableware), you have the added pleasure of knowing that your new possessions are museum pieces. To make sure that new generations will keep production and standards up, next autumn a glass school on Murano will take in its first 40 pupils for a two-year period of professional training. Retired master blowers will teach the secrets of their craft; painters, draftsmen and engravers will impart their knowledge of glass decoration; art his-tory lessons will widen the otherwise local horizons (most students will come from the Venice area). Jobs with Murano firms are assured for at least 80 percent of those who get their diploma.

San Francisco's Compact Variety By Robert Lindsey

AN FRANCISCO—The roses are in bloom in Golden Gate Park. Richard Wagner has been casting his spell at the Opera House. The Golden Gate Bridge, as usual, is getting a fresh coat of the red-orange paint that seems to blend so beautifully with the colors of sunset. Herb Caen, the popular columnist for The San Francisco Chronicle, is still trying to convince people not to say "Frisco." And on Fisherman's Wharf, the few fishermen who are still there are asking again: Where have the crabs gone?

Perhaps no other U. S. city of its size — it has fewer than 720,000 residents — offers so rich a tableau of sights, sounds, cultural attractions, ethnic diversity and culinary andmarks as San Francisco.

It has been fashionable lately among local people to complain that the cable cars, which resumed their legendary climb halfway to the stars a year ago after being silenced for almost two years for a systemwide overhaul, are noisier. But San Franciscans seem to have few other complaints as they await the unnual summer influx of tourists to the place they refer to simply as The City.

Situated at the tip of a peninsula ringed on two sides by its beautiful bay and on a third by the Pacific Ocean. San Francisco is com-pact and relatively easy to tour. A visit of two or three days allows enough time to see most of the city's highlights, such as Chinaown, Fisherman's Wharf, Nob Hill and Russian Hill, Golden Gate Park, the Union Square shopping district, North Beach and the Montgomery Street financial district. and leaves enough time to ride a cable car, explore some of the city's 24 miles of waterfront or visit a museu

Fisherman's Wharf, according to opinion surveys, continues to be the city's most popular destination with visitors, even though many oldtimers say sadly that over the last decade it has taken on the gaudy atmosphere of a carnival, especially in summer.

The Red and White Fleet (415-546-2810) operates 45-minute tours of the bay every 30 minutes or so from the wharf, with the first boat leaving at 10:45 A.M. The fare is $7.95; for juniors 12 through 18, $5.95; children 5 to 11, $5.95; under 5, free.

In conjunction with the National Park Service, the Red and White Fleet takes visitors to Alcatraz Island, site of the former maximum security prison that is now a tourist attraction. Boats leave hourly from Pier 41 near Fisherman's Wharf between 8:45 A.M. and 2:45 P.M. Warm clothing and comfortable walking shoes are recommended. The fare is $4; children 5 to 11, $2.50.

San Francisco is a city for shoppers. A few blocks from Fisherman's Wharf is Ghirardelli Square and The Cannery, both former industrial buildings that have been redeveloped into clusters of shops, boutiques and restaurants. Nearby is Cost Plus Imports, a sprawling six-story complex of imports from around the world.

The Union Square neighborhood is a world-class shopping district with not only dozens of small shops, some 60 at the threestory Galleria complex at 50 Post Street, and Gump's, an elegant gift store at 250 Post. but large ones operated by Neiman-Marcus, Saks Fifth Avenue and Macy's.

HE Airporter bus leaves every 15 minutes from San Francisco International Airport for the city's downtown terminal at Taylor and Ellis Streets. The fare is $6. A taxi ride from the airport costs about 522, including tip.

If you plan any side trips from the city, you il probably want to rent a car. If you do, abide by the city's strict parking laws: Policemen are aggressive about ordering illegally parked cars towed away; and when you park on a hill, turn the wheels into the curb rightly to keep the car from running away.

If no out-of-town trips are on your agenda, a car is unnecessary. The city's hills can make walking difficult, but San Francisco is well served by taxis and it offers one of the nation's easiest-to-use public transportation systems: the transit network includes not only cable cars, but also buses and trolleys operated by the San Francisco Municipal Railway and high speed trains of the Bay Area Rapid Transit District (BART).

San Francisco from the Golden Gate. es and streetcars require an exact fare of 60 cents; rates vary on BART, depending on the distance traveled. For information about the Municipal Railroad routes, call 415-673-6864; for BART the information line is 415-

The San Francisco Convention and Visitors Bureau (415-974-6900), which operates a Visitor Information Center at 900 Market Street, is a good source of information about the city. A telephone information line (415-391-2000) informs visitors each week of interesting current events. Ask for one of its publications, "The San Francisco Book," a convenient compendium of information for visitors. Among the best of the guidebooks is the "San Francisco Access" book ($9.95) published by Access Press of Los Angeles.

American Family Inn/Bed & Breakfast (415-931-3083) offers an unusual way to spend the night in San Francisco - on a sailing yacht or power boat berthed on the bay. The rate for two for a night is $100 to $120. The company also makes bookings for bed and breakfast establishments in the city and its environs, with rates ranging from $50 to $90 nightly.

The Compton Place (340 Stockton Street; 415-781-5555) is one of the city's newest and best-run hotels, with a friendliness and at-tention to detail reminiscent of a small, deluxe European hotel, but with the kind of efficiency found at America's best-run hotel chains. Its dining room, specializing in seafood and other examples of California cuisine, is one of the best in the city. Dinner for two is about $85. Double rooms are $150 to

Other recently opened hotels include the French-owned Meridien (50 Third Street; 415-974-6400), where Walter F. Mondale stayed during the Democratic convention (rates $140 to $205, a $99 a night weekend special with a rental car is sometimes available), and the Ramada Renaissance (55 Cyril Magnin Street; 415-392-8000). Rates $120 to $165.

The Four Seasons (495 Geary Boulevard; 415-775-4700) is a first-rate hotel two blocks from Union Square that was thoroughly remodeled a few years ago. The price of a double room is $150 to $220.

The Stanford Court (905 California Street; 415-989-3500) is at the Center of things on Nob Hill, and its Café Potpourri is one of the most pleasant places in town for breakfast (about $25 for two). A double is $165 to $210.

Visitors still crowd into the elevators of the nearby Mark Hopkins Hotel at Califor-nia and Mason (415-392-3434) to ride to the glass-walled cocktail lounge known as the Top of the Mark, with its view of the city and the bay. Rates are $160 to $210.

The Sheraton-Palace (639 Market Street;

The Canterbury (750 Sutter Street; 415-474-6464) has a relaxing English atmosphere and is reasonably priced at $68 to $98 for a double. Specialties at both include local rex sole and petrale sole, sand dabs and Dungeness crab. Because of a shortage in local waters, much of the these days comes from Washington and Alaska. Purists prefer cracked crab, which means it comes cold, usually with mayonnaise, and with its hard shell cracked so you can extract its flaky white meat without much trouble. GOLDEN GATE PARK

Matching Policy to Needs Is Travel Insurance Goal

by Roger Collis

NSURANCE people love to tell cau-tionary tales. There's one about a British pilot on vacation in Florida whose wife and three children were drowned when their rented car was hit by another automobile and plunged into a canal. The other driver was found at fault and the pilot pressed for damages. However, it transpired that he was unemployed and not worth suing personally. Moreover, he carried only the minimum $20,000 third-party insurance re-quired by the state. Half of this sum went for legal expenses and there was barely enough money to ship the bodies home.

Most prudent Americans are protected with uninsured motorist (UM) insurance, which is generally unnecessary in Europe. here most countries have either unlimited third-party coverage or much higher com-pulsory levels than in the United States. The problem is that UM is so far not available to

The lesson of this tragic tale is that if you rent a car in the United States or Canada, you should consider taking out a top-up insurance policy for both third-party liability and personal accident. Most major car rental firms provide automatic third-party coverage of $300,000, well above the minimum in any state, but woefully inadequate if you are involved in a serious accident in the great land of litigation. Most comprehensive travel policies exclude automobile driving grom personal liability coverage and personal accident benefits rarely exceed $25-50,000. A policy that provides a partial solution is TopSure, marketed in Britain and designed specifically for North American car rental. A premium of £54.50 (about $70) will buy $2 million of third-party coverage and $300,000 personal accident coverage for a 14-day rental period. It's expensive, but it might help to alleviate a catastrophe. The first thing to consider when buying travel insurance is protection against catastrophe. This will depend on where you're going and what you plan to do. For example, you will need more medical coverage in the United States, say $500,000, than in Europe, where $50,000 should be ample. If you are going to a remote part of Africa, make sure you have emergency medical repatriation acoverage. If you are just driving from France into Germany, vehicle breakdown may be your main concern. On the other hand, trip cancellation insurance may loom large if you have just booked an expensive world cruise. In any event, spread your insurance sensibly.

But before you start shopping for travel insurance, be aware of what coverage you already have; duplication is unnecessary and expensive. Most of us already have sufficient life insurance. Executives are usually covered 24 hours a day by their company's global policy. Home ownership plans often provide protection for personal liability and loss of baggage and valuables. If you charge your tickets to a major credit card, you may be covered automatically for death or injury on public transport, personal liability, loss of laggage and money, flight delay and some-times even medical expenses.

One of the most attractive of the credit card free insurance plans is the British Diners Club (benefits vary considerably in the other national Diners Club franchises), BOUL DELEGNER ACCIDENT OF erage of £75,000, the same amount for medical expenses (including emergency dental treatment and air ambulance), £500,000 for personal liability, £75 if your scheduled departure is delayed for more than four hours, if your baggage is mislaid for six hours, if you are bumped off a flight, miss a flight due to failure of public transport or miss a connecting flight because of the late arrival of an aircraft. There is also free baggage insurance of £1,500 and a shopping policy, which covers for loss or damage of any article pur-chased with the card for up do 30 days.

Visa International is less lavish with free insurance. According to a Visa spokesman in London, the best deal is offered by Z-Bank in Austria. All you need to qualify is to have made any purchase with a Visa card in the in previous month. You are covered for medical expenses of 30,000 schillings, personal accident 200,000 schillings, personal liability seven million schillings and loss of baggage 25,000 schillings. Skiing is specifically included and there is even 3,000 schillings.

insurance for ski breakage. American Express offers relatively meager free insurance ($100,000 for common carrier accident, $100 for flight delay, bumping and missed connections and up to $200 for baggage delay) but cardholders can buy the Amex Centurion comprehensive travel po-licy (marketed in Britain and certain other countries under different names). It is an annual policy you can buy in any of three units. First is medical, which provides £75,000 of hospital care, no limit on emergency repatriation through Europe Assistance, family care both on the trip and at home (including medical treatment of children at home) and the cost of close relative to visit you. All this for a premium of £35. The second unit covers personal liability up to £500,000, baggage £1,000, and cancellation and curtailment of a trip up to £2,000 for an additional premium of £15. The third part is a comprehensive vehicle assistance plan, which costs £25

The International Airline Passengers Association has a new policy for its members

Protection from catastrophe is the main idea outside the United States. The annual preminm of $168 provides for $300,000 medical expenses (including emergency repatria-tion), $120,000 personal accident, $600,000 personal liability, $1,500 for baggage loss and $1,200 for cancellation. It also covers winter sports up to 21 days a year.

Both these policies are fairly typical of the best comprehensive travel insurance avail-able outside the United States (where premi-ums tend to be higher and benefits lower than elsewhere. Britain is probably the most competitive travel insurance market). Extra-Sure (from the TopSure people) offers a comprehensive policy for £120 a year, with medical expenses up to £100,000. It includes three months of continuing medical care back home as well as the cost of a colleague flying out to replace an executive who falls sick. A similar policy is SuperSure, marketed by Hong Kong-based Jardine Matheson.

An annual policy is probably the best buy for the frequent traveler, but make sure there are no restrictions on the number of trips and that the limit on the duration of any one trip is not less than 90 days. Also check that any claim you make is not deducted from the total annual benefits.

But if you are only making one or two trips a year, it is worth considering the per-trip holiday/business policies. They are more expensive (typically, the annual equiv-alent of 30 days is twice that of an annual policy) but per-trip benefits can be much higher. For example, SuperSure Plus from Jardine Matheson and American Express Travel Protection policies both have medical coverage up to £1 million and cancellation insurance of £3,000 and £3,500 respectively. You also can have worldwide coverage or choose only European coverage, which is less than half the cost.

Before you buy, look carefully at the exclusions. What does the fine print say about pregnancy? Are family members covered and how? What abut hazardous activities, like winter sports and motorcycling? Is there an upper limit on single items of baggage and undeclared valuables? Will you need a separate policy for your video equipment? Does medical coverage include a reliable emergency assistance service? Are medical expenses guaranteed up front or simply re-imbursed when you return? Are you fully insured from the time you leave home, or only when you arrive overseas?

Be especially careful with limitations and restrictions on cancellation and curtailment. Some policies allow business reasons. Others limit bona fide reasons to death or illness of a close relative at home or in your travel

If in doubt, get the insurer to take you through "What if?" scenarios rather than the abstractions of policy jargon.

Travel insurance is certainly worthwhile provided you shop around and match the policy to your needs. But bear in mind that nobody ever buys insurance, someone always sells it to them.

Tracing the Footsteps of the Crusaders

by Nitza Rosovsky

HE Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, the name by which the Crusaders rule over the Holy Land is commonly known, lasted from 1099, when the Crusaders "rescued Jerusalem from the yoke of the infidel," as one contemporary account put it, to 1291, when the city of Acre was retaken by the Moslems. At its zenith, the kingdom stretched from Beirut to Eliath, from the Mediterranean to the Jordan and beyond.

Even though the kingdom was in a constant state of siege, a building boom of a magnitude rarely equaled in the land occurred during the period of Crusader rule. Despite man-made and natural disasters the Israeli landscape is still dotted with 12thand 13th-century remains, and a visitor can soon learn to recognize the idiom of a Crusader architecture in the Holy Land.

There were three types of construction: military, religious and civilian. Forts and castles, churches and monasteries, mas, markets and hospitals were built by the Crusaders to defend their holdings and to serve the needs of pilgrims. The style was basically Romanesque with some early Gothic ele-ments; a few local motifs were introduced by native craftsmen.

In Jerusalem, the city that had beckoned from afar, Crusaders' footprints abound. Capture of the city came after a five-week siege. On Friday, July 15, 1099, Godfrey of Bouillon and his men finally scaled the wall and won the battle for Christendom. A terrible massacre ensued. The Jews, who had fought alongside the Moslems, were locked up in a synagogue and set on fire.

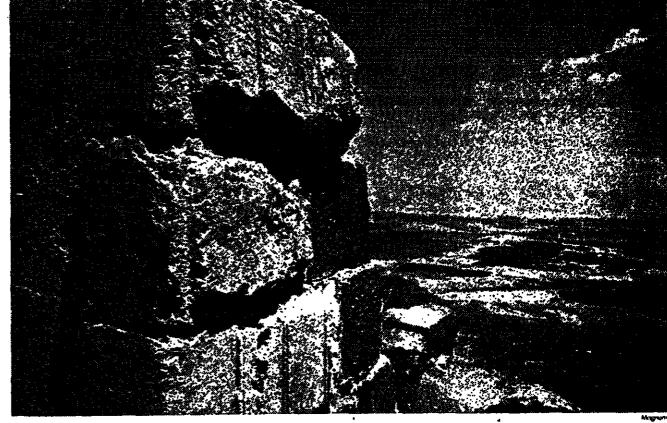

Later that day, Godfrey, Tancred and the other leaders of the First Crusade made their way barefoot to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher. At the church they found evi-dence of the damage inflicted earlier in the centry by the Egyptian Caliph el-Hakim. Soon, returbishing of the church began; it was completed and celebrated in 1149, 50 years to the day after the Crusaders' victory.

Unlike the interior, the facade has changed little since the 12th century. The double portal (the right one has been blocked since the days of Saladin, the Moslem ruler) and the two corresponding windows on the second floor are accented by three archivolts supported by engaged col-umns. The capitals with a foliage motif and the rosette-frieze were common to local architecture since the Byzantine period. The voussoirs - the evenly shaped stones in the arches - may have also been influenced by Eastern masons. The carved lintels of the portai, depicting scenes from the life of Jesus, have been removed to Jerusalem's Rockefeller Museum for preservation. On the terraced roof, near the Ninth Station of the Cross, are the remains of the Crusader refectory and cloisters. The remains now surround a cluster of mud huts - the Ethiopian holding in the Holy Sepulcher - where Southeast of the Holy Sepulcher are the Three Covered Bazzars, built to produce income for the Order of the Templars and the Church of St. Anne. Light enters the bazaars through apertures at the top of the groin vaults; the shops, still in use, are small and dark. The central bazaar, Suq el-Attarin, was known as Rue de Malquisinat (the Street of Bad Cooking) for the quality of the roasted meats sold to pilgrims there. Not all foods were poor, however. Oranges, peaches and bananas were available, along with a variety of breads, and local wines kept chilled in snows from Lebanon.

At the southern end of Sug el-Attarin begins the recently excavated Cardo, an elegant arcaded street from the Byzantine era. Shops on either side of the street, added some 600 years later by the Crusaders, have recently been renovated to accommodate modern goods. Below street level, one can see remains of fortifications from the sixth

AST of the Cardo, on Misgav Ladach Road, is the partially restored Church of St. Mary of the Teutonic Knights. The church was established in 1128 to care for German pilgrims who might have felt unwelcome in the French-dominated Crusader Jerusalem. The church, which had a hospital and a hospice attached to it, was the modest birthplace of the Teutonic Order, which later became so powerful that it conquered the state of Prussia and gave rise to its militaristic spirit.

The most beautiful Crusader church in Jerusalem is St. Anne, the traditional dwelling of Mary's parents. It was turned into a madrasa, a religious school, by Saladin after his victory over the Crusaders in 1187, as is testified to by an inscription above the portal. Some seven centuries later, after the Crimean War, the Turks presented this building to the French government, which committed it to the care of the White Fathers, a religious order.

Romanesque in style, built of white stone, it is pure and austere. The facade is elegant in its simplicity. A plain, triple-pointed arch marks the main portal; above it is a delicately carved molding. Only the top window is adorned, flanked by pillars and capitals. Six cruciform piers divide the interior into a nave and two sixles. The central anse creates nave and two aisles. The central apse creates a chevet, an unusual rounded projection in the exterior of the eastern wall. Light filters into the sparsely furnished building through a few clerestory windows. The acoustics are superb; to hear mass sung here — divine. (Mass is sung every morning at 6:30)

Some time after the conquest of Jerusalem, the Templars — the order charged with protecting pilgrims in the Holy Land — implanted themselves on the Temple Mount and refurbished the Mosque of Aksa. The Crusaders renamed it Templum Solomonis for Solomon's Temple, which had stood on the Mount some 2,000 years before. The zigzag central arch in the entry porch is Crusader as is the small octagonal edifice northwest of the Dome of the Rock.

That building was turned into Templum Domini, and the octagonal structure served as its baptistery. Known today as the Dome of the Ascension, the former baptistery is a fine example of Crusader architecture.

If one leaves the Temple Mount through Bab el-Silsileh (Gate of the Chain in Arabic) one can see the twisted marble columns on either side of the gate, which probably come from a Crusader structure, as does the "recycled" rose window in the water fountain across from the gate.

Before leaving Jerusalem one should visit the Citadel, an amalgamation of walls, towers and other fortifications. In the Crusader period, as the city changed hands more than once, the Citadel often served as the defenders' last stronghold. At its southwestern corner one can see the glacis and the outer wall of the fosse — the dry moat.

In the autumn of 1099, having fulfilled their vow to redeem Jerusalem, most of the Crusaders returned home. Those who stayed behind were known as the Franks - Christians of European, mostly French, origin. Noblemen, merchants artisans, even peasants - most of the Franks settled in urban centers such as Jerusalem, Acre, Tiberias and Bethlehem. The country's indigenous Christians detested the haughty Franks, who had replaced their clergy and liturgy in the churches. The Moslems who survived the First Crusade were mostly farmers who were allowed to continue to till the land and produce foodstuffs for the urban Franks. The Jewish population was almost completely eradicated by the Crusaders.

One of the main tasks of the 150,000 Franks (about a third of the total population) was to keep the highways safe for pilgrims. Since the pilgrims were in constant danger of Saracen attacks, the Franks built a strong network of forts and castles along the borders and on major routes and crossroads.

ELVOIR, a few miles south of the Sea of Galilee, is a fine example of a castrum, as a small Crusader fort was known Known in Hebrew as Kochav Hayarden (Star of the Jordan), it commands a sweeping view of Mounts Hermon and Tabor, the Golan, the Sea of Galilee and the Yarmuk and Jordan valleys. One could observe any movement on the nearby road, one of the ancient trade routes from Egypt to Damascus, which crosses the Jordan near Beit She'an. Belvoir was built in the middle of the 12th century and served the Knights of St. John, also known as the Order of the Hospitalers.

Belvoir, which was meant to withstand prolonged sieges, is a double fort. The outer portion is a rectangle, 330 by 440 feet long, Square towers stand at the four corners and at regular intervals. Entry is over a culvert and through a low, fortified gate. Inside is a courtyard with arcaded corridors that used to house stables and storage areas. The inner fort is built around an open court where one can still see the Hospitalers' dining quarters, kitchen, ovens and steps that led to a chapel and bedrooms. The bedrooms are now gone, as is the upper part of the keep.

Belvoir served the Hospitalers well until the time of Saladin, to whom it surrendered in 1189, after an 18-month siege. In the 1220s, the fort was partially destroyed by Saladin's nephew, el-Malek el Mu'azzam.

Before leaving, the visitor might look again at the view and listen to the whispering eezes that gave Belvoir its Arabic name -Kaukab el-Hawa (Star of the Winds).

Keeping the sea lanes open was of vital importance to the Franks, who depended on arms, supplies and men from Europe. Acre, on the coast just north of Haifa, with its natural harbor, was second only to Jerusalem in its importance to the Latin Kingdom. The city, which is at least 4,000 years old, was famous since Phoenician times for its glass and for the dye extracted from the purple murex, a local snail. King Baldwin I captured the city in 1104.

Like other Mediterranean coastal cities, Acre was conquered with the help of Italian merchant fleets. For their assistance, commercial and other privileges were granted to the merchants; Venetians, Genoese, Pisans and Amalfians occupied large sections of Acre. The Orders of the Templars and the Hospitalers dominated the rest of the city, which, noted a contemporary visitor, "is so populous as to surpass all the rest." A Moslem traveler described it as the "focus of ships and caravans, and the meeting place of Moslem and Christian merchants . . . Its streets are choked by the press of men so that it is hard to put foot to ground." The traveler also commented on the preponderance of crosses and "pigs"—his term for Christians. Like most of the country. Acre was conquered by Saladin in 1187, but the balance of power shifted with the arrival of Richard the Lion Hearted and the Third Crusade. In 1191 Acre returned to Christian hands and became for a century, the capital of the Latin Kingdom, replacing the fallen Jerusalem.

The grand quarters of the Hospitalers in Acre were built mainly after 1191. A century later, when the Moslems demolished the city, they found the complex too solid to destroy and covered it with rubble. It took the Israelis 12 years to remove more than 30,000 cubic feet of debris from the subterranean halls that housed the Master of the Hospital-ers and his administration.

The entrance to this subterranean Crusader city is opposite the Mosque of el-Jazzar.

After reaching the courtyard through a large Turkish gate, one can see, on the right, several huge rooms covering an area of 500 square yards; the barrel vaults are 25 feet high. This area, known today as the knights' halls, may have served as barracks.

Acre, the last Christian stronghold in the Holy Land, came under siege on April 5, 1291. "The enthusiasm of the Moslems was wrote one historian, "that the number of volunteers exceeded the regular forces." The walls and towers were bombarded by siege machines; the moats began to be filled. King Henry II of Cyprus arrived with his fleet, but it was too late. On May 18 the Saracens "in numbers past counting" broke through the walls. The Franks who tried to flee were captured and killed. The last tower, held by the Templars, was being undermined when its defenders agreed to surrender. So many Saracens then entered the tower that it collapsed under their weight, crushing hundreds of Christians and Moslems. The conquerors destroyed the city's markets, towers and walls, and Acre was in ruins for centuries. Thus ended 200 years of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem.

Chefs Burned Up Over No-Shows

by Florence Fabricant

OR some tourists, a visit to France without dining at a fine restaurant would be as unthinkable as passing up the cathedral at Chartres or the Eiffel Tower. Yet the number of people who reserve a table and fail to show up is increasing according to some of France's top chefs, some of whom are asking for deposits when they accept reservations. The culprits are mainly tourists, American tourists in particular. But the no-show problem is worse in Paris because some Parisians have started making multiple dinner reservations and honoring only one. "We try to do our best, but some people play games with us so that now we are taking steps to try to correct the situation," said

Alain Chapel, whose restaurant in Mionnay, near Lyon, is one of those with the top threestar ranking in the Michelin guide. Chapel has joined Paul Bocuse and Pierre Troisgros, who also own three-star restau-

I rants in the Lyon area, in insisting that reservations made from the United States be accompanied by $50 deposits. "We discovered, after examining our rescryation books, that a number of reservations had been made by the same people at all three restaurants for the same date and time," Bocuse explained. "Obviously, they were waiting until the last minute to decide where they wanted to eat or which place was the most convenient for their itinerary. The problem was that they neglected to cancel at the other two places."

In essence, travelers are now doing to French restaurants what they have long done in overseas air travel - making multiple and eat in my restaurant in the future. We're just trying to be serious about this."

Chapel said he would return the deposit if the reservation was canceled at least several hours in advance. "But if they give you an hour's notice, there's not much you can do," he said. "We are out in the country, and arranging things with a waiting list is not so easy." He estimated that every party of two that did not show up cost him about $150.

Paris restaurants are also taking action. For example, La Tour d'Argent, the land-mark restaurant in Paris with a view of Notre Dame Cathedral, asks for deposits of $25 a person. Other Paris restaurateurs have set up confirmation systems to protect themselves from no-shows, which in some instances are reported to be as high as 50 percent. At his two-star restaurant, Michel Rostang requires that dinner reservations be reconfirmed by 2 P.M. that day. At Jamin, a small restaurant not far from Place du Trocadéro that was recently elevated to three stars, hunch reservations must be confirmed by 11 A.M. and dinner reservations by 6 P.M. or the table is

It is not only better-known establishments that have to cope with the crush of advance reservations and the plethora of no-shows. Paul Bajade, who owns Les Chênes Vertes, a restaurant in Provence with 18 tables, said there had been occasions when 40 percent of the reservations, most of them made by tourists, were not honored. Antoine Magnin, the 85-year-old ownerchef of L'Ami Louis, the calculatedly rundown bistro famous for its foie gras and hearty, earthy cooking since 1928, holds an inch-thick sheaf of letters from Americans requesting dinner reservations, often months in advance. "There is no way I can deal with this," he complained. "I have no telex or secretary so that I can reply to all these. It's Bocuse felt that asking for deposits would discourage the practice. "I'll return the deposit." he said. "I do not want to create any more than a week in advance. For regular Bocuse prefers reservations made via tel-ex. "With it you usually have a business with an address to go back to, and in my experience, the people who use it are more serious," he said. "I feel much less secure with a letter or a telephone call."

In Paris, the deluge of reservations for top restaurants annoys many city dwellers; on paper, at least, their favorite establishments are often filled. "Now I have to call at least a week ahead for a table," remarked Francois Trèves, an executive whose office is near Taillevent, where he likes to dine.

Some Parisians, however, are contributing to the problem by playing the no-show game. From his Michelin two-star restaurant, Guy Savoy said the practice involved making a dinner date with friends and inviting them to the house for a drink. The bost, who has made several reservations, then asks where everyone wants to eat, mentioning the three or four reserved places. "They decide where they want to go and forget to cancel the ATELY, many Parisian restaurants, in-cluding Alain Senderens' new Lucas-Carton on Place de la Madeleine, are demanding that everyone who reserves a table provide a home or office telephone number. Tourists must provide the name of the hotel where they are staying. Lucas-Carton expects patrons to confirm reservations the day before; the restaurant will not make the confirmation call to the customer.

For Americans who have made or are lanning to make dining reservations in France, it is advisable to reconfirm the day before, if possible, and, if possible, cancel a reservation at least a few hours in advance. If you don't speak French, a hotel concierge can help. Those who prefer to dine early should keep in mind that few of the better restaurants, especially in Paris, serve before

The choreography of the nuns' ballet is generally attributed to Filippo Taglioni, and his daughter Marie danced the role of Héléna, the principal nun. She stepped out of the part after a few performances, however, greatly upsetting Meyerbeer, who considered her participation crucial. During the rehearsals for the opera, Nourrit handed Filippo Taglioni the scenario for the ballet that became "La Sylphide," which Taglioni choreographed and presented the following season with Marie in the title role. It is considered the first full-fledged Romantic ballet, so it is reasonable to regard the nuns' ballet scene in "Robert le Diable" as a direct

The sound this made reminded Rossini of "the squawk of a capon having his throat cut," but it secured Duprez's fame anyway, and Nourrit left the Opera and the repertory he had created within a year, never

There is some interesting pictorial documentation of the original production of "Robert le Diable." In the 1860s and "70s. the artist Edgar Degas did a series of four paintings — in effect group portraits of friends using the Opera as the setting. The background is unmistakeably the set for the nuns' ballet, and by comparing it with con-temporary lithographs of the original production it can be seen that the Opera was still using the original scenery or a copy thereof.
"Robert le Diable" remained in the repertory at the Opera's theater in Rue Le Pele-

tier, and moved to the company's present home, the Palais Garnier, when it opened in 1875. It had its 758th and final performance there on Aug. 28, 1893. By then, changes in public taste had left Meyerbeer behind, although the grandest of his grand operas — "Les Huguenots" — hung on in Paris until 1936. In a way, the ornate splendor of the Palais Garnier is a kind of architecture equivalent of a Meyerbeer opera, but by the time it was opened the composer's works were on the way out.

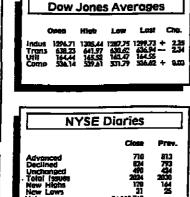

Meyerbeer's best music, with its striking orchestral effects and shrewdly calculated finales, was much admired by Berlioz, but not by Schumann, who compared him to a circus performer. Although Meyerbeer was generous in helping the young Wagner, the latter later repaid his benefactor with insults ("a Jewish banker who composes music"). Nonetheless, Meyerbeer lives today mainly through his influence on early Wagner ("Ri enzi" and "Tannhäuser") and Verdi, whose "Don Carlos," written for the Paris Opera in 1867, is very likely the greatest of French grand operas, even if it is heard only in Italian these days.

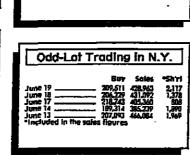

The young American conductor Thomas Fulton, who had a success with "Don Carlos" at the Orange festival last summer, is in musical charge for this revival, with Petrika Ionesco the stage director. The cast on Monday is headed by the French tenor Alain Vanzo in the title role, Samuel Ramey as Bertram, June Anderson as Alice and Michèle Lagrange as Isabelle.

For this revival the Paris Opera seems to be playing the game to the hilt. Its press information reports that the sets have required 10,000 cubic meters of wood, 3,500 square meters of painting fabric and five tons of sculpted latex, while the 600 cos-tumes and 600 hats required 1,000 meters of satin. Besides the soloists, there will be 96 chorists, 76 extras and 40 dancers in the corps de ballet. It should be fun.

Cellular Phones Display Early Signs of Inadequacy

By ANDREW POLLACK

New York Times Service

EW YORK — Cellular mobile telephone service, which is just getting started in most U.S. cities, is already showing signs of inadequacy. The technology was supposed to allow for a vast increase in the number of people who could own car telephones. But already, with only an estimated 150,000 such phones in use, the cellular-telephone providers say they are in danger of running short of capacity, and are asking the Federal Communications Commission to provide additional radio frequencies for mobile-phone service.

Capacity is already close to being reached in Chicago, West Los Angeles and parts of Orange County, California, according to officials of companies that trade group, says that limits will be reached in all 10 of the largest cities within five years.

These statements have been greeted with astonishment in some circles, because shortage of capacity was the very thing the cellular technology was supposed to prevent.

"It doesn't seem to be living up to its promise in terms of spectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, an FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, an FCC commissectrum efficiency, "Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency, "Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency, "Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency, "Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency, "Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency, "Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency, "Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency, "Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency, "Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency," Mimi Weyforth Dawson, and FCC commissectrum efficiency effi sioner, said. "No one conceived" the industry would want new frequencies so soon, she added.

Before cellular-telephone technology arrived, mobile-phone service was extremely restricted. Generally, a single antenna served an entire city and there were, at most, 44 channels available, and often less. On New York telephone's system, for instance, only 12 mobile telephones could be in use at once.

Cellular-radio technology, as it is also called, was supposed to change all that. In this technology, the city is divided into smaller cells, each with its own antenna serving only that cell. As a driver passes from one cell to another, sophisticated computers insure that the call is handed off from one antenna to the next.

ENCE, the same frequencies could be used by different drivers in different parts of the city. Moreover, as the number of customers increased, capacity could be increased merely by splitting cells into smaller cells, so that the frequencies could be shared by even more people.

But this turned out not to be the case. Cell splitting so far has

But this turned out not to be the case. Cou spining of channels what has been important is that the FCC, when it authorized the number of channels cellular-telephone service, increased the number of channels available in each city to 666. In other words, even if a city is not divided into any cells at all, the new system can handle at least 15 times as many simultaneous calls as the old system.

There are other "real world" problems, as well. For one thing, cellular-telephone use is highly concentrated in certain neighborhoods, such as downtown areas, so that having cells outside those areas does not help much.

And the industry officials say there is a practical problem in continually shrinking the cells below a radius of two miles (3.2 kilometers) or so. In Chicago and West Los Angeles, the cells are

As the cells get smaller and closer together, coordination among different cells becomes more complex and interference

Moreover, the antenna must be situated near the middle of the fell for optimal performance. But as cells get smaller, the range of antenna sites gets smaller and it gets more difficult to find a roof or spot of ground.

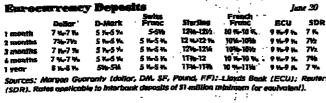

You start to encounter local resistance to the proliferation of antennae," said Reed Royalty, vice president of external affairs for Pactel Mobile Cos. "Sometimes we find that we just can't locate a cell site in its optimal spot."

In Chicago, Ameritech had to buy, and then demolish, a building to clear a space for an antenna. In Tucson, Arizona. local residents objected to a tower spoiling their view. In Bedford, (Continued on Page 21, Col. 5)

Rebound Is Seen in Germany

Building Slump Still a Concern

By Warren Gerler

FRANKFURT - The West German economy, after a 1-percent drop in first-quarter gross national product, is again growing with the aid of strong exports and capital goods production, the Bundesbank said Thursday in its June report.

The report cantioned, however, that economic growth remains handicapped by serious problems in the construction industry.

Severe winter weather compounded the construction industry's troubles and contributed to a 40-percent drop in orders for new homes in the first four months from a year earlier, the report said. Demand for homes has stabilized at a low level, but there are no immediate signs of a turnaround, it added. The Bundesbank emphasized that extraordinary influences the severe weather, the problems of the home-construction industry and concerns over auto-emission controls — contributed to the dramatic slowing of the economy at the year's outset.

"Without the weather-induced fallout of production, real gross national product [in the first quarter] would not have been lower than the previous quarter," the Bundesbank

As was previously reported, seasures the value of a nation's goods and services, fell I percent in the first quarter from the last quarter of 1984.

The Bundesbank said a marginal half-percent rise in private consumption in the first quarter from the previous quarter was attributable to consumer uncertainty about new emission-control regulations in Europe and related tax-incentive programs. It said that as of April, when the timetable for the new regulations was clarified, domestic orders for cars had picked up.

Some economists noted, however, that the main reason for weak private demand was not the emis-sion-control controversy but high

How Delaware Molds Takeover Law State's Supreme Court Rulings Have National Impact

By David A. Vise Washington Post Service
WASHINGTON — In the midst of the frenetic merger activity that is reshaping corporate America, the Supreme Court of one small state is rewriting the rules that govern conflicts be-tween management and stock-holders in takeover battles.

Because many of the nation's largest public companies are in-corporated in Delaware because of its favorable tax laws, the Delaware Supreme Court is in the

Since the beginning of the year, while Congress has held hundreds of hours of hearings to try to decide whether new federal rules regulating mergers are needed, the Delaware Supreme Court has been involved in some controversial cases that are altering the existing rules in Delaware and affecting court decisions in other states.

Last month, the Delaware Su-preme Court administered the first major defeat in a takeover battle to T. Boone Pickens, the chairman of Mesa Petroleum Co. In Unocal Corp. vs. Mesa Petroleum Co., the court ruled that

The court said that since Mr. Pickens's two-tier bid for Unocal was coercive and inadequate, and because his past activities that his principal objective was the right to exclude him from its offer to buy back its own stock. Once the decision was an-nounced, Mr. Pickens dropped his bid to acquire the company.

Greenmail is the term used to describe the profit made when a stockholder, who has launched a hostile takeover bid, agrees to drop the bid if the target compa-ny will buy back his shares at a premium price.

Daniel L. Goelzer, general counsel of the Securities and Exchange Commission, said the SEC staff plans to recommend a challenge to the Delaware ruling in the Unocal case. Mr. Goelzer said the SEC staff believes that federal law requires all shareholders to be treated equally in a tender offer such as the one Uno-cal made to all of its shareholders but Mr. Pickens.

Dollar Surges On Economic Report in U.S.

NEW YORK - The dollar drove higher Thursday after the government reported that the U.S. economy has picked up steam, a development that analysts said diminishes chances for further declines in interest rates. The Commerce Department re-port, released midway through the European trading day and at the start of business in the United States, said that the gross national product was growing at an annual rate of 3.1 percent in the current quarter.

The GNP is the value of all of the country's goods and services, and the slightly larger-than-expected rise indicated to many currency and that the barses for lower interest alysts that hopes for lower interest rates have faded.

He said that the strong economic growth figures, coupled with the continued low level of inflation evident in a separate government re-port which said consumer prices rose 0.2 percent in May, have quieted talk of the chances for a cut in the Federal Reserve's 7.5 percent discount rate, its interest charge on loans to financial institutions. James T. McGroarty, vice presi dent at the securities dealer Discount Corp., said the GNP growth figures "postponed any kind of dis-count rate reduction for another week or so."

Late Thursday, the dollar ex-tended its gains after the Fed re-ported that its basic measure of the money supply shot up by a larger-than-expected $4.8 billion in the week ended June 10.

WASHINGTON - General Dynamics Corp. said Thursday that it has offered to sell the U.S. Air Force a stripped-down version of its F-16C lighter for a cheaper, guaranteed cost of $9.7 million

The Air Force now pays $18 mil-lion to $20 million for each F-16C. General Dynamics said the new offer would save the government $1.3 billion.

Last month, Northrop Corp. submitted a proposal to the Air Force offering 396 F-20 Tigershark jet fighters at a fixed price of $15

Herbert F. Rogers, a vice president and general manager of General Dynamics' division in Fort Worth, Texas, acknowledged that the offer was prompted in part by Northrop's unsolicited bid.

"Competition is a wonderful thing," Mr. Rogers said. "Obvious-ly, I'm working as a contractor to protect my business." Northrop has spent hundreds of millions of dollars on the F-20, but has been unable to sell it to the U.S. military or to foreign governments.

With its offer, it hoped to gain a share of the current Air Force market for 720 front-line lighters over the next four years. It proposed that the purchases be divided evenly between F-16's and F-20's.

The company said the fac-tory, in Ribeauville, near Colmar, will play a central role in Sony's audio and video production in Europe. Sony already has two fac-

Most of the capital expenditure was for plants and fabrication facilities in the United States and assembly and test equipment facilities for Southeast Asia.

Two weeks ago, National Semiconductor said it planned to lay off 1,300 workers in the United States and Europe and would cancel plans for a new plant in Oregon.

National's problems are similar to those of other U.S. semiconductor manufacturers, caught in a slump brought on by slow computer sales, a major influx of Japanese Japanese manufacturers. Many U.S. chip makers are scaling back or abandoning planned expansions. And the U.S. Special Trade Representatives office said this week that it would investigate complaints that Japan had "dumped" semiconductors on the U.S. market.

COLOGNE - Ford Motor Co.'s West German subsidiary. Ford-Werke AG, reported Thurssche marks ($99.3 million) for 1984, compared with a net profit of 150.6 DM a year earlier. The managing board chairman, Daniel Goeudevert, said at a news conference that sales last year fell 4.2 percent, to 12.79 billion DM, from 13.35 billion DM in 1983.

But Mr. Goeudevert said an upward trend could begin in 1986. In the first five months of 1985, sales rose 5 percent from the year-earlier level, although production was 5 percent below the level in the corre sponding period of 1984. Measures to cut costs will not show results in the short term but will help a return to profit in the medium term, he said. Last year's loss was the compa-ny's first since 1980. It was due largely to external factors such as high unemployment in Europe, high Japanese exports, stiff compe

The parties to this litigation have entered into a Stipulation of Settlement, dated March 21, 1985, and the Court in the Lewis Action has scheduled a hearing on August 1, 1985 (the "Hearing"), to determine, among other things, whether the proposed settlement should be approved as fair, reasonable and adequate, plaintiff's application for attorneys fees and expenses and any assertions of interest by any persons who purchased Saxon debentures after April 15, 1982 ("post-petition debenture purchasers"), as assignees or transferees of the claims of any member of the Class.

percent of the work force — the highest rate for that mouth since ers in the first four months outpaced orders in the same period in 1984 by 6 percent, measured by volume, and foreign orders jumped 12.5 percent, the Bundesbank reported. Against the strong fourth quarter last year, domestic orders in January-April were up 3 percent

New Phones Inadequate

(Continued from Page 17) Massachusetts, it took a year for a tower to be approved by the zoning board after encountering local op-position. And in Manhattan, many buildings are simply too high. Indeed, what was pictured in theory as a nice honeycomb pattern of hexagonal cells is turning out to be more a haphazard jumble of amoeba-shaped cells. "All of these things look really great when you draw the circles on paper," said Martin Cooper, chair-man of Cellular Business Systems, a Chicago company that provides data-processing services to cellular-telephone companies. "But the real world is not like that." The FCC, which is not expected to rule on the matter for several months, has proposed increasing the spectrum allocated to cellular telephones by roughly 30 percent. But the proposal is opposed by those who want to use the spectrum for other uses, such as telephone service for airplanes and mobile communications using satellites.

These opponents say that the cel-lular-telephone providers are asking for more spectrum merely because it is cheaper to add capacity that way than to continually split cells. It costs $500,000 to $800,000 for each cell site.

A consolidated action is pending in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, 82 Civ. 3103 1MJL: (the "Consolidated Action"), on behalf of all persons who purchased common stock or debentures of Saxon Industries, Inc. ("Saxon") during the period March 31, 1976 through April 15, 1982, and who suffered damages as a result thereof (the "Class"). The parties to the Consolidated Action have entered into a Stipulation of Settlement, dated March 21, 1985, and the Court in the Consolidated Action has scheduled a hearing on August 1, 1985 (the "Hearing"), to determine, among other things, whether the proposed settlement should be approved as fair, reasonable and adequate, plaintiffs' application for attorneys' fees and expenses, and assertions of interest in connection with the proposed settlement by any persons who purchased Saxon debentures after April 15, 1982 ("post-petition debenture purchasers"), as assignees or transferees of the claims of any member of the Class.

By Patricia Meyer Spacks. 287 pages. $18.95. Alfred A. Knopf, 201 East 40th Street, New York, N. Y. 10022.

Reviewed by John Gross

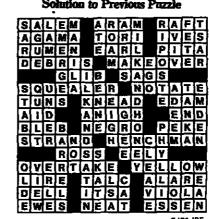

PATRICIA Meyer Spacks is a professor of English at Yale whose books include "The Adolescent Idea," "The Female Imagination" and studies of 18th-century literature. Now she has undertaken an anatomy of gossip. As you would expect, it is a learned work, drawing on a wide range of sources. It makes a number of excellent points, and shows considerable skill and sensitivity in its handling of literary texts. It is also somewhat grotesque.

The painting reproduced on the jacket, "L'Heure de l'Apentif," shows a café full of "I'Heure de l'Aperitif," shows a cale full of elegant women in picture hats, and you would be forgiven for supposing that it holds out delicious prospects. But Spacks bangs that notion on the head right away by devoting her opening chapter to the "problematics" of gossip. In due course, we learn that gossip has "the intimacy of dyadic exchange," and that its aesthetic includes the "valorizing of story." Nor should we be surprised if much oral gossip belones to "a modality of trust." since one of belongs to "a modality of trust," since one of its functions is "verbalizing shared discovery."

The jargon of the seminar room falls thick and fast — "metonymic," "paradigmatic," "liminal status." Not even Jane Austen is spared. "Gossip's hermeneutic power generates the internal dynamic of 'Emma,' "Spacks observes with gay abandon.

While technical terms have their rightful place in linguistics or anthropology, it is hard to believe that this is the most appropriate way to address a general audience, least of all on such a topic. The urbanity of an informal student of manners like Louis Kronenberger would surely have provided a much better model. And what makes Spacks's approach all the more incongruous is that she is so very much in favor of gossip. She praises it for its

sesthetic and moral power, for its humanizing effect, its emphasis on individual circumstance, for the alternative to official values that it offers the underprivileged, above all for the "bonding" it creates among those who take

Naturally she recognizes that this is only one side of the story. The gossip she values is "serious" gossip, which she describes at the outset of the book in arcadian terms, as civilized exchange between two people who have created for themselves "a psychic space like that of Arden or Thessaly" and who cherish the opportunity it gives them for innocuous "emotional speculation." But there is another kind of gossip, the kind that moralists and satirists have denounced over the centuries the gossip that belittles, betrays secrets, invades privacy, tears reputations to shreds.

Spacks makes some show of standing back and holding the balance between opposing views of her subject. "Those understanding gossip as fellowship typically deny its malice;" she writes, "those stressing its destructiveness ignore its bonding."

But in practice she herself comes down heavily on the positive side, using loaded language about the "virulent condemnation" of gossip by those whose fears spring "from pre-rational depths." She argues that "gossip that seeks to damage others is probably rather rare—easy to imagine as an activity of the faceless figures who inhabit dark recesses of our minds, the informatily stident in our living troops." but infrequently evident in our living rooms."

Much of what she says in favor of gossip is persuasive, and some of the denunciations of it are no doubt as overheated as she claims, But she seems to me ludicrously optimistic, positively Panglossian, in the way she consistently plays down the pain that gossip can inflict and the amount of malice that goes into it. Cast skies really be as blue as she seems to think, even at Yale?

Gossip means many different things, from character assassination to innocent small talk. and it would have been better, I think, if Spacks had dealt rather more with the middle range of the spectrum — from the amable (without being arcadian) to the malicious (but only mildly so) — and paid rather less attention to the extremes. I also wish she had had more to say about real gossip in the real world.

and less about gossip in literature.

The most valuable parts of the book are the detailed discussions of novels and other literary works. Spacks brings an alert critical intelligence to bear on Horace Walpole's letters,
"The School for Scandal," "Vanity Fair," "The Great Gatsby" and a score of widely differing writers from Boswell to Eudora Welty. An interesting chapter on "social speculation" examines the links in a number of novels between gossip and money. There are also some splen-did and well-chosen quotations — though it has to be said that they stand out all the more brightly against the prevailing academic prose.

Heated Battle of Chicago Pits Old Passions Against Modern 'Realities'

By Ira Berkow New York Times Service

CHICAGO — A battle rages in Chicago over the baseball team on the North Side, officially the Chicago National League Ball Club Inc., but better known as the Cubs, or — to the incurably passionate — the Cubbies. Specifically, the battle concerns the ball park: To put or not to put lights in Wrigley Field, that is the question. The battle has been raging for more than three years now, and it is getting hotter.

It is conceivable that if the Cubs, the defending National League East champions and currently in the thick of another division title race, are involved in postsesson play they will play their games not in Wrigley Field, nor even in Comiskey Park, home of the White Sox of the American League. Dallas Green, the Cubs' president and general manager, has suggested the games could be played in some distant National League hippodrome, such as Riverfront Stadium in Cincinnati or Busch Stadium in St. Louis.

"We've got to come out of the Stone Age," said Green.
"And if postseason play is taken out of the city, I've heard it estimated that Chicago would lose $100 million in

"It's blackmail," said Nancy Kaszak, president of Czeus United for Baseball in the Sunshine (C.U.B.S.). As some see it, the battle concerns the struggle to go from the primeval days to the Technological Age. Others see it as a struggle to retain the simple, esthetic virtues of the past. It pits small homeowners and tenants against a major corporation. It has involved the television networks and Madison Avenue and the courts and the Illinois legislature and the Chicago City Council and possibly even the baseball standings. Wrigley Field is unique among the 26 major-league ball felt they would wreak havoc in the streets and upset bedtime schedules in the Lake View residential neighborhood where Wrigley Field is located. Furthermore, the Wrigleys believed that baseball was meant to be played in the day, and on grass. There also is no artificial grass in Wrigley Field.

On June 16, 1981, it was announced that the Wrigleys had sold the team to the Tribune Company, which owns The Chicago Tribune newspaper and the radio and television stations WGN. The TV station is a superstation and has broadcast Cubs games since 1948. There is little question that one of the Tribune Company's main objectives was to keep the Cubs with WGN, and to keep them for reasonable rates.

The Tribune Company has not evidenced any of the concerns for nighttime neighborhood tranquillity that the Wrigleys did. When Cubs management met with the Citizens Council — C.U.B.S. is a committee within the up - Mrs. Kaszak said that Green told them, "If it's a fight you want, it's a fight you're going to get."

The Citizens Council moved quickly and pressured the state legislature and the city council to enact bills prohibiting night baseball in Wrigley Field - and its concomitant noise, crime and neighborhood disruption.

The Tribune Company contended that this was unfair, and that it should have virtually unrestricted use of its parks in that it is the only one without lights. Since lights first shone upon a major-league game, in old Crosley Field that Bowie Kuhn, then commissioner of baseball, signed in Cincinnati, on May 24, 1935, every park then in with ABC, which will televise World Series games this contract of the part and be upder under the part and t played at night. According to Chuck Adams, a spokesman for the new commissioner, Peter Ueberroth: "The commissioner has said that he is contract-bound," and has made no attempt to influence ABC to change the agreement.

The Tribune Company took its case to court. On May 25, Cook County Circuit Court Judge Richard L. Curry handed down his opinion in favor of the citizens' group.

"The scheme which has major league baseball trashing a residential community and tinkering with the quality-of-life aspirations of countless households so that television royalties might more easily flow into the coffers of 25 distant sports moguls," he wrote, "is not 'consonant with brick outfield wall thickly covered with vines of bitter-present-day concepts of right and justice.' Indeed, it is

year. ABC has the option of demanding that all games be been in Chicago, and he understands the passions involved with many of the 55,000 residents of Lake View. The Wrigley family, which owned the team from 1921 Advertising during prime time brings in more money than still, he would like lights in Wrigley Field on "a limited until 1981, had vowed never to put in lights because it was advertising during the day. And the more money televibrais." "Maybe 18 to 20 regular-season games a year," he Still, he would like lights in Wrigley Field on "a limited

He said that if light towers are not installed, and perhaps an additional 10,000 seats to the upper deck of the second-smallest ball park in baseball — Wrigley Field seats 37.242; Fenway Park in Boston, 33,583 — the team might even leave Wrigley Field. Mayor Harold Washington of Chicago has assigned a study of the possibility of building a domed stadium near the Loop.

Mrs. Kaszak said that would not be acceptable to the community. "The Cubs are part of us there," she said, "like the schools, the theaters, the stores. And I bet there are more Cub fans per square inch in Lake View than there are anywhere else in the world."

Many consider Wrigley Field, built in 1914, to be an esthetic treat. It is one of the few vintage parks left, along with Comiskey Park, which opened in 1910, and Fenway Park and Tiger Stadium in Detroit, both in 1912. It is a great contrast to the impersonal modern stadiums and indoor baseball edifices that have proliferated in recent years. It is a park in a residential neighborhood, one of the last of its kind. The dark, heavy grandstands give way to the hish green of the grass, the brownish-red of the basepaths, pitcher's mound and batting area, and the red records in baseball history. They have not won a pennant since 1945, longer than any other team now in big-league baseball. But even in their leanest years, they were drawing a million fans a year. It was due to loyalty, as well as the simple pleasure of enjoying a ball game in "the friendly conlines of Wrigley Field."

The Cubs, too, are unusual. They have one of the worst

Last season, with Green's trades and deals coming to fruition, the Cubs started to win. People lined up around the park starting at dawn to get tickets. The Cubs won their division, and attendance for the regular season soared to a club-record 2.1 million.

Although they lost to San Diego in the playoffs, this year the love for the Cubs is even greater. There were a record 25,000 season tickets sold, and the Cubs appear on the way to drawing about 2.4 million.

Last month, Ueberroth, who was born and raised in Evanston, Illinois, the first suburb north of Chicago, attended a game at Wrigley Field. He said he had a grand time. Shortly afterward, he met with legislative leaders in Springfield, the state capital.

An amendment to the state law barring the Cubs from playing night games at Wrigles Field won preliminars approval Wednesday in the Illinois General Assembly. The Associated Press reported from Springfield. The amendment would lift the ban only for playoff games [

"I think baseball ought to be played at Wrigley Field and for the long term." L'eberroth said, "It is a great stadium and in some years hence it will be typical of the perfect type of stadium that people will look for." That raised a curious notion: Wrigley Field, which some

call an anachronism, is now, in the view of baseball's commissioner, the "perfect type of studium" for the fu-

Gooden Fans Cubs; Hawkins Loses First of Season

NEW YORK — The New York Mets' Dwight Gooden struck out the game's last batter Wednesday night, having gotten the two previous hitters to pop up with two men on base, to hand the Chicago Cubs their eighth straight loss, 1-0. But in Los Angeles, the San Diego Padres' pitcher, Andy Hawkins, had his unbeaten streak stopped at 11.

Gooden pitched a six-hitter as the Mets beat the Cubs for the third straight time. He struck out nine, raising his major league-leading total to 125, and reduced his major league-leading ERA to 1.66.

in the fourth, Ryne Sandberg and Leon Durham got back-to-back base hits, the Cubs' first. Gooden struck out Richie Hebner and got Thad Bosley to hit into one of the Cubs' three double plays.

Keith Moreland and Ryne Sandberg opened the ninth with singles. Then Gooden got Leon Durham and Richie Hebner on pop flies, and ended the game by striking out Bosley to the cheers of 51,778 lans.

NCAA Wants to Begin Tests for Drugs

NEW ORLEANS (WP) - The NCAA wants to begin testing athletes for performance-enhancing and street drugs at some championship events and bowl games by early next year, John Toner, chairman of the group's drug-testing committee, said Wednesday.

The committee, meeting on the eve of a special convention on issues of institutional integrity, is putting into final form recommendations for the NCAA Council to consider at its August meeting. After that, a councilsponsored proposal for drug testing would be placed on the agenda for a vote by the membership at the annual convention in January.

Degrees Offered to Former Athletes

NEW YORK (AP) - In the wake of the release last week of a survey showing that only 27 percent of the college basketball players in the United States had been graduated, 11 colleges have formed a national consortium to offer degrees to former athletes who left school without graduating.

Northeastern's Center for the Study of Sport in Society will coordinate the program, which will readmit, without tuition, any former students who entered school with athletic scholarships since 1975. The other schools involved are St. John's, New York University. Seton Hall, William Paterson, Georgetown, Temple, Long Beach State, California, Denver and San Francisco.

Presidential Fussiness

By Russell Baker

EW YORK — Dr. Harold J. Liverworth, world's foremost authority, has comforting news for lussy men. In his new book, "Fuss Without Fear," the doctor urges such men to "fuss to their hearts" content" and ignore "so-called scientific studies" suggesting that fussiness shortens life expectancy. spoils picnics and reduces the amount of time spent watching

"Nonsense" is Liverworth's reply to such gloomy findings by the Fuss Research Institute Founda-

All of the institute's data, he notes, come from experiments on laboratory mice. And fussiness in mice, he maintains, is so different from fussiness in men that data about a fussy mouse's behavior at a laboratory picnic can tell us noth-ing useful about how a fussy man might behave.

Liverworth's book deals only with fussy men: "As a friend of the feminist movement. I was reluctant to study fussy women without permission from Carla Calzone, founder of the Fussy Women's Lib-eration Caucus and author of the est-selling 'I Fuss When I Please.' Ms. Calzone withheld that permission, but assured me that if I left fussy women to her she would not attempt to beat me into print with a best seller on fussy men.'

Ms. Calzone's kindness meant that Dr. Liverworth did not have to do a hasty, slapdash piece of research to race a competitor for the best-seller-buying audience. As a result, we have a thorough, scholar-ly study as splendid as any of the 124 books the doctor has produced in the last 13 years, including "Taming the Adolescent Male with Pants Suspenders," "Auto Transmissions: Metaphor for Modernity," and "How High-Carbohydrate Eating Affects the Mood of Expense-Account Auditors."

One always hesitates to quarrel with the doctor, and fortunately "Fuss Without Fear" contains very little that needs to be challenged. However - and let us hope the doctor will take this in good spirit and not be provoked to write another book like "Hack Journalists: Causes of the Rot in America's Moral Fiber." as he was when my review of "Auto Transmissions" criticized him severely for not examining what the loss of the automobile running board had done to the United States.

However, as I was saying, though generally sound this time, Liver-worth is talking through his hat when he says President Reagan is "proof that a fussy man needn't alienate friends and family, but may indeed be loved by millions."

By what standard does the doctor classify Reagan as "fussy"? Well, says the doctor, he is "extremely fussy about presenting a dynamic but cheerful impression it the presence of cameras.

So what? The Fuss Foundation's mice experiments showed that even mice — all mice, unfussy as well as fussy — became intensely fussy about creating a good impression when cameras appeared.

Very well, Liverworth sneers at the Fuss Foundation's mice studies, so let's discard the nevertheless valid comparison of mice and president and cite human cases.

Specifically, the case of my friend Vanikker, widely known on both coasts, the Riviera and in Illinois as a man so unfussy that he will have two martinis before dinner, then waste a great Bordeaux by pouring it across his anesthetized

An unfussy man, obviously. But draw a camera on him and, lo! "Not 'til I comb my hair!" he cries. I once saw Vanikker panic when a snapshot fiend caught him wearing a short-sleeve shirt with button-down collar open at the throat, without necktie.

"Wait," he shouted, "until I find out what the right kind of people do about the button-down collar when the necktie is off."

He absolutely refused to let the shutter click until he had called the Princeton Club, long distance, for a consultation. Opinion there was divided. The result? Vanikker changed into a different shirt.

I cite the case only to prove that Liverworth errs in supposing that fussiness in the presence of cameras makes President Reagan a fussy man. All men are fussy when the camera aims their way, for what the camera produces can be kept as evidence, and who wants the evidence to tell the truth about us?

By Ari L. Goldman New York Times Service

THE smile of Anne Frank, perhaps as much as I her famous diary, has become a symbol of the power of the human spirit over evil.

To picture the gifted girl who died 40 years ago at the hands of the Nazis is to see a pretty, darkhaired child doing children's things — sunning on the beach, jumping rope, playing with a pet rabbit and, most strikingly and consistently, smiling.

Last week, on the day that would have been Anne Frank's 56th birthday, the Union

Theological Society and Anne Prank's 1

Theological Seminary in New York began an exhibition of newly released photographs images of her world. The opening of the New York exhibition coincided with openings of almost identical shows in churches in Amsterdam and in Frankfurt, where she was born on June 12,

Her view of the world was summed up in a famous line from the diary: "In spite of everything, I still believe that people are really good at heart."

The entry was written only weeks before a German officer broke into the secret annex of a building in Amsterdam where the four members of the Frank family and four other Jews had hidden for two years. All eight were sent to concentration camps; only Anne's father, Otto Frank, survived. After having been rejected by numerous publishers, Frank had the diary printed in Dutch in 1947.

The story has been told in movies, plays and in the more than 30 languages into which the diary of Anne Frank has been translated.

The new exhibition of 800 photographs and documents, "Anne Frank in the World: 1929 to 1945," puts the story in the context of the events of the day. And it asks the question, "Had Anne Frank, a typical child, lived next door, could she have counted on us for help during the Nazi regime?" After three weeks, the New York exhibition will travel to other cities in the United

In addition to dozens of photographs of the Frank family and their place of temporary sanctuary, whose entrance was concealed by a hinged bookcase in the back of a spice factory, there are pictures of the conditions that led to the Holocaust. There are the soup kitchens in Germany during the Depression of 1929, the Nazi youth rallies, the hands raised in salute to Hitler and the word "Jude" scrawled on the shops of Jewish merchants.

One series of pictures shows the large Frankfurt synagogue afire on Nov. 9, 1938, and the Jewish shops with shattered windows after Kristallnacht required yellow star, efforts at resistance and the eventual roundup and deportation of Jews to concentration camps. Finally, there are the chilling pictures of cattle cars packed with people, terror-stricken faces, death camps and mass graves. Three-quarters of the 140,000 Jews in the Netherlands perished.

The photographs, mounted on 21 triangular upright structures, are the same at the U.S., Dutch and German shows.

Each exhibition also has a sampling of original documents. Among those in New York are written exercises for a correspondence course in Latin that Anne took, under the name of a friend, during her confinement. The envelope in which it came was addressed to Elli Voskuyl, one of the Christian women who helped the family in hiding. There are also pages of the original diary, written in Dutch, in which each entry begins with a salutation to an imaginary friend, "Lieve Kitty." The material was put together by the Anne Frank Center in Amsterdam, which maintains a museum in the building in which the family found Several of the pictures in the exhibitions were given to the Anne Frank Center by relatives of Otto Frank after his death five years ago at the age of 91 in Switzerland. The international director of the center, Bauco van der Wal, said the existence of the pictures was not generally known until recently.

Soon after Frank's death, the Dutch War Documentation Institute announced plans to publish portions of Anne's diary that had been deleted by her father. The passages dealt with Anne's awakening sexuality and disagreements with her mother, Edith, who died of starvation in

Van der Wal, who has read the passages, said that the project to publish the complete, unedited version was still under way and that the book would not be ready for release for at least a year.

The confessions in the passages, he said, may have shocked the father at the time he read it after the war, but would not be considered surprising today. The passages, he added, would tend to reinforce the picture of a spirited young woman aware of life's hardships but still ready to smile. In the published diary, which has sold more than 13 million copies, Anne Frank wrote on Dec.

Believe me, if you have been shut up for a year and a half, it can get too much for you some days. In spite of all justice and thankfulness, you can't crush your feelings. Cycling, dancing, whistling, looking out into the world, feeling young, to know that I'm free — that's what I long for, still I mustn't show it, because I sometimes think if all eight of us began to pity ourselves, or went about with discontented faces, where would it lead us?"
